Leyton (February 16-23).—It was believed that three thousand competitors took part in this Eisteddfod, which rightly bears the title, for music shares the syllabus with knitting and photography and shorthand and other arts and crafts. Throughout the week the adjudicators were kept busy attending to the many musical events that swelled the number of competitions to over two hundred. Some were poorly supported, but in the aggregate there was good and keen competition, and the Festival may be written down a marked success. It has not yet succeeded, however, in fostering choral singing to a proportionate degree.

The London Musical Festival, Central Hall, Westminster, attracted 3,850 entries. Choirs and all ensembles are counted as single entries, therefore fully twelve thousand persons competed. It is certain that this enormous number would have been larger but for the influenza visitation and an unusually early Easter. Twenty-nine well-known adjudicators were engaged. Great interest attached to the more important events, and the various halls were closely packed on many occasions. The standard generally was well up to the average, and particularly so with the younger competitors. This augurs well for our musical future, as careful training was in evidence. On the whole, the juniors relatively eclipsed their seniors. It should be noted that many choirs and units came long distances; the Isle of Man, Channel Islands, and Ireland all being represented. Space does not permit of a full list of awards in the hundred and seventy-four classes announced, but we give brief results of the outstanding events:

Daily Telegraph Shield, Maidstone Choral Union (conductor, Mr. F. Wilson Parish); London Challenge Shield, London Scottish Choir (conductor, Mr. J. Hodge); Challenge Cup (small choirs), Abbots Langley Choral Society (conductor, Mr. A. Foster); Ladies' Premier Class, (1) Ramsey Cushag Choir (Isle of Man) (conductor, Mrs. M. Purcell Black); (2) Mr. E. R. Benton's Choir (Grimsby); Ladies' Choirs, (1) Streatham Singers (conductor, Mr. F. Haggis); (2) Manx Ladies (conductor, Mr. Noah Moore); Men's Choirs, Maidstone Choral Union (conductor, Mr. F. Wilson Parish); Church Choirs (men and boys), St. John's, Clapham (conductor, Mr. Seaton Rivers); Church

Choirs (mixed), Watford Wesleyan (conductor, Mr. Wallis Bandey); Girls' Clubs, National Training College (conductor, Miss Rind); Equal Voices (under eighteen), Hillside Convent College, Farnborough (conductor, Mr. James Bates); Band of Hope Choirs, Loughborough Park (conductor, Mr. A. Reeves); Elementary Schools (boys), Mitcham Lane (conductor, Mr. W. Meaton); Elementary Schools (girls or boys, under twelve), Raywood Street School, Battersea (conductor, Miss M. Proverbs); Elementary Schools (girls), Mitcham Lane Demonstration School (conductor, Miss Bones); Girl Guides (Princess Mary's Standard), 13th Watford (Wesleyan) (conductor, Mr. Wallis Bandey); Children's Choirs (Princess Helena Victoria's Shield), Gilbert Bartholomew Club (conductor, Miss C. Lucas); Gold medal (soprano), Joan Coxon, Farnham; Gold medal (mezzo), Joyce Morton-George, Woodford Green; Gold medal (contralto), Margaret Potts, Kenton; Gold medal (tenor), Allan Fouracre, Bingley, Yorks; Gold medal (baritone), Geoffrey Denton, Sutton; Gold medal (bass), Frederick Hard, Letchworth; Vocal répertoire, May Haynes, Leytonstone; Lieder Class (duet for voice and pianoforte), Gwenyth Misselbrooke and Ernest Booth, Southend-on-Sea; Gold medal (pianoforte), Cecil Turner, Maida Hill; Pianoforte répertoire, Margaret Chamberlain, Hampstead; Violin (gold medal), Ruth Pearl, Stamford Hill; String Orchestra (senior), Ethel Loder's Orchestra, Finchley; Small Orchestra (senior), Sheen School of Music (conductor, Miss Grant); School bands (elementary), Hither Green L.C.C. School (conductor, Miss Murray); Organ, John Freeman, Clapham; Musical Composition, Maurice Blower, Haslemere; Elocution (gold medal), Golda Casimir, Westcliff.

Loughborough (March 15 and 16).—This is known as a great meeting of choirs. Indeed, Loughborough claims the record entry of male-voice choirs amongst all Festivals—thirty-one. This year twenty-three competed, Shiregreen (Mr. Poppleton) being the winner with a sprightly and adroit performance of Blumenthal's 'What care I?' Pye Hill (Mr. Bonsall) and Alfreton (Mr. Haslam) were bracketed second. Over a score of other choirs had entered, but influenza kept a few away. Matlock P.M. (Mr. Wildgoose) won the Levy Shield in the class for choirs from places of worship, and came second in the mixed-voice class, Nottingham Philharmonic winning there by two marks. Mr. W. Turner's Ladies' Choir led in the female-voice class, with Leicester Oriana (Mr. A. C. Nicholls) second. When the winners in these four fine classes competed for the Gilbert Tucker Challenge Cup, a very close contest resulted in the victory of Nottingham Philharmonic. The solo classes were well supported, and an excellent start was made in a class new to this Eisteddfod, that for school orchestras, with an entry of seventeen. The classes for children's choirs brought forth some sterling work. Ilkeston Gladstone Street Boys (Mr. F. Taylor) won the Loughborough Monitor and Herald Shield, Nottingham Trent Bridge (Mr. B. Hart) being second, and in the senior class the latter choir took first place, Long Eaton Sawley Road Senior School (Mr. Oldham) being only two marks behind. Over fifty young elocutionists were also heard. The pianoforte solo classes had to be taken in two portions, so great was the entry. The Senior Cup, competed for by twelve first-prize winners (players, singers, and reciters) was won by Blanche Upton, of Netherfield, a pianist.

Perth.—The ninth Perthshire Festival ran for eight days at Perth. Public interest was well maintained; entries about the same as last year, but not so good from school choirs. Principal awards: Mixed Choirs—Open, Perth Madrigal Society; County, Luncarty Choral Society; Folk-Song, Lochgelly Co-operative Choir; Rural, Luncarty Choral Society. Men's Choirs—Barr & Stroud's Choir, Glasgow. Women's Choirs—Open, Philomel Choir, Grangemouth; County, St. Leonard's U.F. Church, Perth; Rural, Luncarty Choral Society; W.R.I., Birnam and Dunkeld Institute. Church Choirs—Open, Radnor Park U.F. Church, Clydebank; County, Aberdalgie Parish Church. Junior Choirs—Stirling Arion Choir. School Choirs—M'Laren High School, Callander, Townhead Central School, Montrose, Balhousie Boys' School, Perth, Western District School, Perth, Auchtergaven School, Kinbuck School, and Madderty School. Vocal Solos—General, Catherine F. Lawson, Broughty Ferry; Scots Song, Isa Todd, Madderty. Pianoforte Solos—A. R. Davidson, Abernethy. Violin Solos—Edward J. Robertson, Dundee. Best performance of the Festival, Elizabeth Christie and Muriel Hodge, Perth (women's duets).

Skipton (February 15, 16, 23).—The number of entries reached four figures for the first time. In the choral competitions, held on the two Saturdays, the chief prize-winners were Read and Simonstone Vocal Union (Mr. T. Shaw) in the mixed-voice, and Bocking Musical Union (Mr. J. Hilary) in the male-voice class. Mr. N. Crabtree, a tenor of distinction, repeated the success he had won a week earlier at Huddersfield. The public attendances throughout the Festival were disappointing, and a loss was anticipated.

Swindon (February 16).—In five years the G.W.R. Social and Educational Union has set up a flourishing Competitive Festival among the members of its staff. Over a thousand employees took part in this concentrated one-day event, and four halls were brought into service. The male-voice choral class attracted six choirs, Cardiff being a little ahead of Carmarthen. Caerphilly was best of three mixed-voice choirs. Orchestras played the first movement of Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, the winners again being from Cardiff. Many of the competitions brought in singers and players from all over the G.W.R. system.

Southampton (February 25 to March 2).—This Festival, which is in its fourth year, attracted a record number of entries (fifteen hundred and two), representing some five thousand actual competitors. There was a slight falling away in the choral entries, but the individual classes generally showed improved figures. As in previous years, the combined adult and junior concerts were important features of the Festival. A thousand children took part in the junior concert; at the adult concert, in which some six or seven hundred participated, the principal item was Elgar's 'The Banner of St. George,' for which a local orchestra was engaged, and in which the solo parts were well sung by Miss May de Vaux Fowler (Southampton). The principal awards were as follows: Adult Mixed Choirs (sixty voices and over), Southampton Philharmonic; Adult Mixed Choirs (thirty to forty voices), Wyndham Choral (Salisbury); Adult Mixed Choirs (twenty to thirty voices), Portland Baptist (Southampton); School Choirs (boys), Northern Secondary (Portsmouth); School Choirs (girls), Ascupart Girls' School (Southampton); Elementary School Orchestras, Stamshaw Boys (Portsmouth); String Orchestras, Bournemouth Amateur Orchestra; Male-Voice Choirs, Southampton Brotherhood; Ladies' Choirs, Wyndham (Salisbury); Church Choirs, St. Mary's (Southampton).

Twickenham (February 14-16).—This is a new Festival, initiated by Mr. L. W. Tracey Arkell, organist of Twickenham Parish Church. Juvenile competitors—an ever-ready source of support—were there in plenty, and showed talent in many directions. Grown-ups await further stimulation by the Festival, which, it is expected, will be an annual. Prizes were taken by Twickenham Parish Church Choir, Richmond Gleemen, and Twickenham Amateur Operatic Society.

Wimbledon.—The fifth Festival began about the middle of February, and ran its leisurely course well into March before the hundred-and-twenty classes and the concerts and distributions were disposed of; even now the annual dinner remains (April 20). Choral singing is not yet a strong point in this neighbourhood, but the interest shown by the public and by competitors in all the other kinds of music-making was enough to justify so elaborate a syllabus. The Festival enjoys the chairmanship of one who has his own place in the musical world, Mr. Willoughby Walmsley.

Other Festivals that call for mention are the eighth Beckenham Festival (March 2, 4, 5, 6, and 8), where there was a marked improvement in the standard of the instrumental playing; the fourth annual Festival at Carlton, Nottingham; the fourth Hampstead and Hendon Musical Festival (March 5-9); the tenth Mill Hill Eisteddfod (February 16-26); the second annual Newbury and districts Festival (February 27 to March 1, and March 6); the Festival of the Portsmouth Welfare Association (March 4-8); the City of Plymouth Musical Festival; the annual Pudsey Competitions (February 16); the twenty-first North Notts Festival, at Retford (March 5 and 6); the eighth annual Festival at Shipley (March 9); the eighth Festival organized by the Educational Department of Todmorden Co-operative Society (March 8 and 9); the ninth annual Festival at Hazel Grove, Stockport, with competitors arriving from Cheshire, Derbyshire, Lancashire, and York (February 22 and 23).

Readers in the Midlands should note that entries for the Leamington Festival close on May 8.

The Amateurs' Exchange

Under this heading we insert, free of charge, announcements by amateur musicians who wish to co-operate with others.

Young organist and pianist wishes to meet amateur singer for mutual practice.—G., c/o Musical Times.

Pianist (good sight-reader) wishes to meet lady vocalist or instrumentalist for mutual practice. Finchley district.—H. H., c/o Musical Times.

Sixty Years Ago

From the Musical Times of April, 1869:

As we anticipated, the verdict against Mr. Sims Reeves, which was recorded at the late trial at Cheltenham, has been reversed as soon as the facts of the case were fully placed before the jury. That these facts were so duly authenticated before as they have been since, might have been made sufficiently obvious at the first trial had the medical certificate been admitted as evidence. According to the document, from an accredited member of the medical profession, which was produced in court, Mr. Reeves was 'suffering from a severe cold and sore throat,' so that 'it would have been highly dangerous for him to leave the house.' In spite of this official assurance that Mr. Reeves was incapacitated from singing, however, it was decided that he ought to have sung, and he was cast in damages to the amount of £23, and £10 fine for his non-appearance in Court. To appeal against this decision it was necessary to have a new trial: and Mr. Reeves was compelled to travel down to Cheltenham, when he should have been singing at Mr. Leslie's concert, to repeat what his medical attendant had certified.

The death of Hector Berlioz, which took place at Paris during the past month, will have but little effect upon art or artists; for although in music he thought as deeply, and worked as earnestly, as any who have left an immortal name, his compositions never took a permanent hold upon the public mind. His best works are two Symphonies, 'Harold in Italy,' and 'Romeo and Juliet,' which, although filled with undoubted proofs of fragmentary talent, are now but little known. He had a thorough command of orchestral resources, and an instinctive perception of all that was beautiful in art; but there can be little doubt that he will be more remembered by his able and acute contributions to musical criticism than by any of the compositions with which he hoped to revolutionize the world.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

An interesting chamber concert was given in Duke's Hall on Wednesday afternoon, February 27. Four girls played the first and third movements of Mozart's Quartet in C, and played in first-rate manner; indeed, so good was the general ensemble and effect that the names of the performers are here recorded—Margot MacGibbon, from Victoria (Australia), Joan Allen, of Bristol, Esmé Haynes (a Londoner), and Megan Lloyd, from Rhondda (South Wales).

Unusually intelligent Lieder-singing was heard in two Schubert items, 'Liebesbotschaft' and 'Gretchen am Spinnrade.' Freda Townson, a student from Bolton, has not only a voice of exceptional promise but good interpretative abilities. There was promise, too, in Grieg's 'Solveig's Song,' sung by Bessie Alberta Todd, a Blackpool girl. Another girl singer, with a fine contralto voice, is Muriel Middleton; she sang Secchi's 'Lungi dal caro bene' most effectively, and deserves to be commended for her diction. Perhaps the outstanding performance of this uncommonly good programme was Brahms's Variations on a Theme of Haydn ('St. Anthony'), for two pianofortes, played by Jacqueline Townshend and Dorothy Manley. Both these girls are good pianists.

Included in the appended list of recent awards is the name of Dorothy Haigh, who has won the Goldberg Prize for contraltos. She is the student who gained the Blackpool Competitive Festival Scholarship, and should make a name for herself, for her voice has both beauty of tone and rich quality.

During the Summer Vacation Course for teachers, lectures will be given during the four days from September 17 to September 20, inclusive, on the following subjects: Pianoforte, by Mr. Frederick Moore, each day at 10 a.m.; Class-singing, by Dr. Stanley Marchant, each day at 12 noon; Aural Training, by Mr. Ernest Read, each day at 2 p.m.; Musical History and Appreciation, by Mr. Stewart Macpherson, each day at 4 p.m.

The following awards have been made: Lionel Tertis Viola Prize to Margery North (London), Eileen Grainger being highly commended. Sterndale Bennett Prize (female pianists) to Barbara Kirkby-Mason (London), Margaret Good being very highly commended and Jacqueline Townshend highly commended; Philip Leslie Agnew Composition Prize to Guirne Creith (London); Josiah Parker Prize (composition) to Freda Robertson (London), Ethel M. Winfield being highly commended; Goldberg Prize (contraltos) to Dorothy Haigh (Leeds), Freda E. Townson being very highly commended; Mario Prize (male singers) to Wilfred Miles (Ystrad), Roland Dickinson and Edgar Elmes being highly commended; Edward W. Nicholls Prize (female pianists) to Dorothy Manley (Blackburn), Kathleen Fenton and Margaret Good being very highly commended; Cuthbert Whitemore Prize (pianoforte) to Myers Foggin (Newcastle-upon-Tyne), Dorothy Manley being very highly commended.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC

The second Patrons' Fund Rehearsal of the term, held on March 8, served to give a hearing to four performers and one conductor from three musical institutions. Miss Nellie Palliser (Royal College of Music) sang the big soprano scene from 'Freischütz,' conducted by Mr. Leonard Isaacs (Royal College of Music); Miss Bay Jellett (Royal Manchester College of Music) played two movements of Dvorák's Violin Concerto: the Royal Academy of Music was represented by Miss Freda Townson, in a scena from Mozart's 'Clemenza di Tito,' and Miss Dorothy Manley in Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto.

The last rehearsal of the term, on March 22, was devoted principally to new works by British composers: Leslie Woodgate (String Suite, 'A Birthday Piece'), Robin Milford ('The Darkling Thrush,' for violin and orchestra, the solo part being played by Reginald Morley), and Cuthbert Osmond (third movement of Symphony in E flat).

The most important event of the month in the College, and one of wide interest to the musical world at large, has been the production, for the first time, of Ralph Vaughan Williams's new opera 'Sir John in Love,' of which the libretto, arranged by the composer, is taken entirely from Shakespeare's 'Merry Wives of Windsor,' some well-known folk-songs and dances being introduced at suitable points in the story. The first performances, on March 21, 22, 25, and 26, took place too late in the month for extended comment, and for the present it must suffice to record the event, and the fact that the opera was produced by Mr. Cairns James and conducted by Dr. Malcolm Sargent.

Of other happenings in the month, the orchestral concert on March 1 was noteworthy for being devoted entirely to the works of Brahms, the most conspicuous feature being the B flat Pianoforte Concerto by Cyril Smith, a performance of great artistic merit and intellectual achievement, such as is rarely looked for in a student still under instruction.

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC

The College has been singularly unfortunate in the loss of a number of those who have been for a long number of years its staunchest supporters. Amongst the more recent deaths we have to record that of Henry Riding, for over forty years organist at Chigwell Parish Church, and who had acted as local secretary of the Loughton centre for the College examinations since 1893. We have also to record with regret deaths of the local secretaries at Cork (Prof. Gmür), Shrewsbury (Mr. F. H. Hetherington), and Peebles (Miss L. Noble Green).

A well-attended lecture on 'Interpretation in Pianoforte Playing' was given by Mr. C. Egerton Lowe. The audience, mostly students, found the very practical and interesting treatment of the subject most inspiring.

At a general meeting of the College, held on February 15, Mr. E. d'Evry was appointed as successor to the late Dr. Horner, with the designation of Controller of Examinations. Mr. d'Evry's long connection and experience with the College examinations aptly qualifies him for the post. It is his intention at an early opportunity to visit as many centres as possible. He retains his post as organist of Brompton Oratory.

The Colonial examiners for this year as as follows: Queensland, &c. (also Perth, Adelaide, Melbourne, and Sydney in April and May)—Dr. C. Edgar Ford; China, Straits, Ceylon, E. Australia, New South Wales, and South Australia—Mr. Albert Mallinson; W. Australia, Tasmania, and Victoria—Mr. Adolph Mann; Canada and New Zealand (North Island)—Mr. C. Egerton Lowe; New Zealand (South Island)—Dr. D. Vaughan Thomas; South Africa—Mr. Anderson Tyrer; South Africa (Johannesburg, &c.)—Mr. Charles Schilsky; Egypt, Palestine, India, Burma—Dr. Alfred Mistowski; Newfoundland and Nova Scotia—Dr. J. E. Borland; South America and West Indies—Mr. Ronald Chamberlain. The Controller of Examinations (Mr. Edward d'Evry) will also visit South Africa, and will assist in the examination work.

Successful distributions of prizes and certificates have been held at the following centres: Bradford, Croydon, Gloucester, Harrogate, Liverpool, Nottingham, Walthamstow, Wellingborough, West Ham, and Worcester.

Lecture recitals were given at Liverpool (Mr. C. Egerton Lowe) and Southend (Mr. R. A. Chamberlain).

The programme for the Queen's Hall concert on April 6 includes the following items: Overture 'Ruy Blas,' Mendelssohn; Concerto No. 2 (for violin and orchestra), Wieniawski; Concerto No. 5 ('Emperor') for pianoforte and orchestra, Beethoven; Symphony No. 8, in G, Haydn. The usual chamber music and choir concert takes place at Grotrian Hall on Wednesday, April 3.

London Concerts

ROYAL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY

At the Royal Philharmonic Society's concert on March 31, Mr. Albert Coates conducted a programme of familiar excerpts from Wagner's works. Whether the Society was wise in offering its members, who are accustomed to something rather less hackneyed, a Monday night Promenade programme is a question which will not be answered until the time comes for the renewal of subscriptions. The immediate result was that Queen's Hall was better filled than on other occasions of far greater musical importance.

About Mr. Coates's conducting of Wagner there remains at this time of day very little to be said. He displayed the usual vigour, tempered by more than the usual discretion—born, perhaps, of an awe in the presence of the august traditions of the Society and its tutelary deity, who frowned with his customary disapproval of everything and everybody from behind Mr. Coates's energetic figure.

Mr. Horace Stevens, who sang the Monologue of Hans Sachs from Act 3 of 'Die Meistersinger,' and the 'Abschied' from 'Die Walküre,' made little effort to enter into vain combat with the immense forces behind him, but when he was audible his vocal tone was good. The whole concert merely proved, as it has so often been proved before, that Wagner knew exactly what he was doing when he wrote for the imaginary theatre which was to be realised at Bayreuth.

'THE KINGDOM' AND THE R.C.S.

Perhaps it is possible, without seeming ungrateful, to express the hope that the Royal Choral Society will take the praise bestowed on its performance of 'The Kingdom' as an admonishment as well as a tribute. The choir sang, on the whole, well enough; it can sing better still—and nothing short of the best is acceptable in 'The Kingdom.' The main weakness of the performance, however, was not in the choral singing, but in the orchestral playing and in the readings of some of the soloists. It is impossible to say definitely that the orchestra played badly. It may have played angelically for aught we know. In the vast spaces of the Albert Hall the sound of the strings was completely lost as soon as a trumpet or a trombone began to thunder away. Of course, the whole distribution of the orchestra is wrong, not only in the Albert Hall, but in every concert hall in Europe. The brass should never be just where it can most easily bully the rest of the orchestra. But the Albert Hall emphasises the disparity of tone and position, and in consequence, not only violins but double-basses were seen and not heard on frequent and important occasions.

The soloists, able enough artists individually, were not particularly fitted to their task. The soprano, in particular, lacked the purity of timbre so necessary in 'The Kingdom' and in 'The Apostles.' Miss Joan Elwes may, in time, sing these things admirably. She must first, however, learn to overcome somehow that first handicap. Miss Margaret Balfour and Mr. Steuart Wilson came nearer an adequate reading, and Mr. Howard Fry was actually adequate. But 'The Kingdom' deserves something better than adequacy. Is is not time to give Londoners the opportunity of hearing the two finest works of the century played and sung as they should be?

F. B.

B.B.C. PERFORMANCE OF 'FAUST'

In these days of sharply divided opinion every performance of Berlioz is to the good. The B.B.C. therefore earned gratitude from both partisans for performing 'The Damnation of Faust' in first-class style at Queen's Hall on March 1. Sir Hamilton Harty, the great apostle of Berlioz, was brought down from Manchester to direct the work, and with him the Hallé Orchestra, the choir being provided by the National Chorus. The result was an admirable performance, leaving no one any excuse for uncertainty about his attitude to what is usually regarded as Berlioz's best, because most sustained, work. Sir Hamilton Harty took the quick parts quickly, but, as Berlioz is nothing if not vivid, that was a fault (it did not, in fact, amount to a fault) quite on the right side.

The orchestral playing was exhilarating, though the drummer was once or twice out of tune at critical places. The National Chorus has not yet quite found itself, and though it sang well enough technically (except that Harty's tempi tried the singers once or twice), there was a certain lack of confidence that made for limpness in contrast to the crispness of the orchestra.

Mr. Tudor Davies won a certain amount of sympathy for the character of Faust by avoiding the unrestrained Italian operatic style while giving us an Italian smoothness of phrasing. Miss Stiles-Allen invariably sings set solos well, but is less happy in conveying character; as Margherita's part consists mostly of set solos we felt no dramatic loss, and a good deal of musical gain, from her treatment of the part. Mr. Harold Williams gave us both character and music in his dashing impersonation of Mephistopheles.

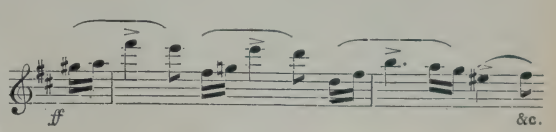
ALBERT WOLFF AT QUEEEN'S HALL

The broadcast Symphony Concert at Queen's Hall on March 15 was conducted by Albert Wolff, of the Paris Opéra-Comique, who was a newcomer in London. He had a good collection of players under him, and he proved himself a very ardent and energetic conductor; but the scrappiness of the programme, which consisted largely of showy, unsubstantial extracts from works of music originally meant for the theatre, made it an unsatisfactory concert.

It is strange that so many concerts begin with a Weber Overture, considering how difficult this music seems to be to play—how seldom orchestras are able to keep exactly together in it, and how rarely conductors prove themselves vivacious without vulgarity. M. Wolff's performance was not faultless, but he is to be thanked heartily for one thing. He gave us this phrase:



without violently pulling it out of shape for the sake of the vulgar circus effect we too often hear.

Florent Schmitt's 'Tragedy of Salome' could hardly have been in better hands. It was quite surprising how much zeal and care M. Wolff lavished over this exacting and pretentious score. It had not been heard in London since Karsavina danced to it, many years ago, at Drury Lane. The music is a typical production of a skilful but unoriginal craftsman in the heyday of the double influence of Strauss and Debussy. Schmitt's outpourings of sound would still do well enough as the accompaniment of a ballet, but the absence of ideas made 'The Tragedy of Salome' rather tiresome as a concert piece.

Some pianoforte pieces by Albeniz, in a garishly overscored version by Arbos, were definitely the least pleasant part of the programme. Dame Ethel Smyth's 'Cliffs of Cornwall' was played in a really superior way. There was also an excerpt from an opera of de Falla's which, when it comes to be performed in English, will no doubt be entitled, 'Brief life is here our portion.' The Concerto of the evening was Delius's, for pianoforte, in C minor (soloist, Miss Katharine Goodson)—an early work, not at all like the Delius we know, but suggesting an emulation of Liszt, with two or three good subjects which the composer (just like Liszt) hammers away at in the ever-frustrated hope that they will develop. Miss Goodson played with a great energy which somehow missed brilliance.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS FOR CHILDREN

Mr. Robert Mayer's admirable enterprise continues to flourish. We were unable to attend any of this season's concerts until March 16, when the last of the series took place. There were very few vacant seats, and the interest and pleasure of the youngsters was a stimulating sight. Dr. Malcolm Sargent, as conductor-cum-uncle, was in his happiest vein with information, illustrations, and humour. The programmes at these concerts build well on a classical foundation, and a typical scheme was on tap for this concert—the 'Magic Flute' Overture, Bach's B minor Suite, the Ballet music from the 'Perfect Fool' (Dr. Sargent, in describing the opera, called the hero 'a Ballet Perfect Fool'), Debussy's Sacred and Profane Dances, and the 'Entry of the Gods into Valhalla.' The children 'reacted' (as the fashionable term is) especially to the Holst work. At the close, Dr. Sargent read a letter from Mr. Mayer, announcing further developments for next season, with similar concerts at Wimbledon and Wembley. The whole scheme will then cater regularly for about twenty thousand children. In these days of uncertainty and discouragement in the concert world, it is good to meet with a show so live.

BÉLA BARTÓK

The playing by Béla Bartók at the B.B.C. private concert on March 2 reflected some of the qualities of his compositions. The tone was rather hard, but clean; the execution effective. It gave an impression of light without heat, and of being music which keeps the interest alive by arousing expectations. This is one side of a composer's talent. The other side is in the fulfilling of expectations he has aroused, and in this I found Bartók's music wanting. His skill, ingenuity, and resource are beyond question. But some composers have said remarkable things without any display of either skill, ingenuity, or resource. And is there not something too much of this folk-song hunting? Is there nothing to be said for the poor man who seeks to express a personal mood or impression without the help of a folk-tune? Bartók's programme was mostly made up of song dances and rhapsodies, the themes of which came all from the same source—folk-song.

The composer had as helper and assistant M. Zoltan Szekely—a very able violinist. F. B.

BUDAPEST QUARTET

A Beethoven programme brought out all the fine qualities of the Budapest Quartet—and they are many. A flawless balance of tone is one of them; another is in the unanimity of their inflections bearing the stamp of a single mind, so that if a phrase proposed by one instrument is imitated by another, the imitation will be perfectly proportioned to the original; a third remarkable quality of their playing is in the exceptional sweetness of the tone in all four players. But with all these excellences something was still wanting to make their reading of the great A minor Quartet what (I conceive) it should be. The tone of the leader, sweet, gentle, persuasive, would have suited an Andante of Tchaikovsky's, or Ernst's 'Elegie,' to perfection; but it could not do justice to the more rugged, austere style of the later Beethoven. F. B.

CATTERALL QUARTET

It was a great pleasure to hear Mr. Arthur Catterall lead in one of the most complex and difficult of the Beethoven Quartets. He has all the skill of the virtuoso without the airs and graces—and this art which conceals art is the first technical requirement of one who would play the later Beethoven Quartets. Other interpreters have made capital of the sense of mystery which pervades them, to a greater extent than Mr. Catterall and his colleagues. But apart from this, the reading, considered from the point of view of intellectuality, was notable for sympathy and understanding.

The 'Unfinished' Quartet of Schubert was a finer example of ensemble playing, second violin, viola, and 'cello entering more thoroughly into the spirit of the work. The tone was balanced to perfection, and the exceptionally neat and finished phrasing of the leader brought out in perfection the rare lyrical charm of the work. F. B.

HUNGARIAN STRING QUARTET

Bartók's third String Quartet was given its first performance in Wigmore Hall on February 19, by the Hungarian String Quartet. The new work, which is in one continuous movement, consists of three sections, of which the third is a modified recapitulation of the first. The formal structure is strong and clear; it is the detail that puzzled one at a first hearing. The harshness of the music seemed at times deliberate to the verge of perversity. Yet, remembering how, after a similar puzzlement at the composer's first Quartet, familiarity with that work, aided by the score, solved the difficulties and changed doubt to unfeigned admiration, one can only wait for further knowledge of the new work before making up one's mind. The Quartet contains, in any case, passages of such strange beauty and emotional strength that one has little doubt that its difficulties will ultimately be smoothed away, and that we shall become reconciled to its discordance. If this seems a timid attitude in the critic, one may plead that to Beethoven's contemporaries his last Quartets must have presented similar perplexities, which did not, however, prevent many from perceiving the inherent strength and beauty of the music. And Bartók, moreover, uses an individual and national idiom, which is strange to us and contributes to the difficulty of understanding him. D. H.

MR. GERALD COOPER'S CONCERTS

The Brosa Quartet, which played for Mr. Cooper at his concert at Æolian Hall on February 26, has fully justified the expectations aroused by its earlier performances. It has now developed a first-rate ensemble. The performance of the great G major Quartet by Schubert was most sensitive in its response to the varying moods of the composer, who ranges from the sunniest laughter to gloomy thoughts which remind one sometimes of Berlioz, but always with a fund of lovely melody at his command. There is a world of difference between this Quartet and some of the earlier works which have been played at these concerts, and have scarcely sufficient of the characteristic charm to make their triviality supportable. The early Quintet in B flat by Mozart (K.174), for which Mr. Lockyer joined the Quartet as second violist, is a slight work belonging to the composer's nonage. The exquisitely finished performance of it was the sole excuse for taking it down from the shelf. Two Fugues from Bach's 'Die Kunst der Fuge,' arranged for Quartet by Mr. H. Greenbaum, completed the programme, in which Schubert's work towered over everything else. D. H.

A GERMAN 'CELLIST

Herr Hermann is a great technician, though not a perfect technician. He performs remarkable feats with such an easy familiarity that he appears to look upon it all with a touch of contempt. It is a mistake to despise your enemy, and Herr Hermann pays the penalty in the occasional flaws in his intonation—flaws which are never very serious, yet distinctly surprising in a player of such consummate skill. Like the left hand, his right uses the bow with enormous deftness. One feels convinced that the studies which teach tricks of bowing have no better exponent than Herr Hermann. Haydn's Concerto, however, holds that which technical books have never taught, and Herr Hermann played it as if it had been a treatise on technique, the 'vile body' used for demonstration purposes. And—oh, what a cadenza! F. B.

ORIANA MADRIGAL SOCIETY

Under the auspices of the Kensington Music Club, the Oriana Madrigal Society gave a performance of Handel's 'L'Allegro' in the hall of the Royal College of Music, with Miss Caroline Hatchard, Miss Mary Morris, Mr. Percy Manchester, and Mr. George Pizzey as the chief singers. Mr. Charles Kennedy Scott conducted. This was a delightful experience. In spite of some misreadings the freshness and the vigour of the music were inspiring, and I left the hall vowing not to miss another opportunity of hearing 'L'Allegro' again—should such an opportunity occur.

The misreadings were chiefly noticeable in the singing of the soloists. They seemed determined to emphasise the contrast between the two characters of 'L'Allegro' and 'Il Penseroso,' and in so doing stressed that which needs no stress. The essential difference—in Milton as in Handel—is not one of temperament but of mood. The pleasures of 'L'Allegro' are not those of 'Comus,' nor the sadness of 'Il Penseroso' that of the fallen angels in 'Paradise Lost.'

The chorus sang accurately and with spirit; the orchestra included first-class players, and the obbligatos of Messrs. William Primrose (leader), Joseph Slater (flute), Aubrey Brain (horn), and Douglas Cameron ('cello) were worthy of a festival performance. F. B.

TWO 'WINTER JOURNEYS'

We have had two performances of Schubert's 'Winterreise,' one by Mr. John Coates at the seventh of Mr. Gerald Cooper's concerts, and the other by Miss Elena Gerhardt at Queen's Hall. The cycle needs a singer with two almost incompatible qualifications—mellowed judgment and the ability to express green sentiment with the appearance of naturalness.

Mr. Coates is the wise, kindly, and, at his moments, cynical philosopher; so it was not surprising that he was more effective in the contemplative songs than in those in which youth exposes itself at its callowest. There was, however, no song in this very distinguished performance—with the possible exception of 'Muth'—which did not yield a good measure of satisfaction. This is due in large part to the great artist's technical control. Now and then a little more fire and sonority might have been desired—but the next moment one's doubt was gone, erased by a beautifully-turned legato phrase, or by a change of colour and tone, which proved equally the singer's rare sensibility and his perfect command over the means of his art.

The best-known songs and, incidentally, the most difficult—'Der Lindenbaum,' 'Frühlingstraum,' 'Die Post,' and 'Der Leiermann'—were perfectly sung. 'Täuschung' was pianissimo throughout, and, taken rather fast, sounded ethereal. 'Letzte Hoffnung' did not stand the furious pace so well, and the music lost much of its proper bleakness in the first part. Mr. Gerald Moore made the pianoforte seem an organic part of the whole. He was no detached accompanist, but played as though he were, no less than the singer, in the thick of the music.

Miss Gerhardt (whose pianist, Mr. Harold Craxton, was also admirable) gave a very different performance. The purist says that the 'Winterreise' is not for women to sing. Miss Gerhardt, however, justified her enterprise by the beautiful, suave tone with which she sang the slower songs. Her art is not one of surprises, and having heard her sing half a dozen songs one knows exactly what to expect. Her careful, true enunciation and musical vowels induce one to sit on and hear her out. Naturally picturesqueness, drama, and youthful impetuosity were absent from this beautiful but rather monotonous performance.

VIOLIN AND 'CELLO

Zoltan Szekely and Paul Hermann played Hungarian pieces for violin and 'cello, and also Ravel's Sonata for that combination, on March 8. They were both good executants, as they had need to be in music that was for most of the time straining to be something other than what it was—a trio or quartet, not a duet. The violin and 'cello do not mix, are not a self-sufficing couple; hence the air of experimentation and preciosity in Ravel's Sonata and of roaming and striving restlessness in Kodály. The latter's duet was something very like fine music, in character passionate and sombre. The players tore their way through it, and managed to produce remarkable sonority. But the impression remained of frustrated effort; and unless pleasures are all to be wrung out of pain, this music will not lure one back to it. A piece by the violinist of the evening began drily, like a pasticcio of the 18th century, and ended flippantly.

C.

It is impossible to report, even briefly, the numerous performances of the 'St. Matthew' Passion which have taken place during the past few weeks. We are therefore compelled to do as we have for some years done in the case of 'The Messiah' performances at Easter and Christmas, and confine ourselves to this general reference.

Music in the Suburbs

After hearing 'The Kingdom' at the Albert Hall on the afternoon of March 2 one could have gone to the People's Palace in the evening and heard it again. When the ear had been adjusted to the presence of a number of amateurs in Mr. Idle's orchestra (a thing not to be dared in the West End), the listener would have found the same inspiration in the choral singing, the same sureness of technique and qualities of tone, vocal and mental. So whole-heartedly have the People's Palace Choral and Orchestral Societies given themselves to the study and practice of what is best in the choral world that they now stand as a representative London body, taking rank with their colleagues in the north and in the west. The solo singers at this performance were Miss Bella Baillie, Miss Margaret Balfour, Mr. Andrew Clayton, and Mr. Thorpe Bates.

The northern colleagues aforementioned are, of course, the Alexandra Palace Choral Society and Mr. Allen Gill. On the same evening they were engaged with 'The Dream of Gerontius' at the Northern Polytechnic, and the performance was one worth going a long way to hear, both as a spiritual interpretation of the work and as a display of choral competence. The solo parts were taken by Miss Betty Bannerman, Mr. Percy Manchester, and Mr. Stuart Robertson.

The 'St. Matthew' Passion was performed by the Dulwich Philharmonic Society, under Mr. Leslie Regan, at the Crystal Palace on March 16. The solos were sung by Miss Eileen Pilcher, Mr. Eustace Belham, Mr. Eric Greene, and Mr. Frederic Woodhouse.

Loughton Choral Society, now in its thirty-seventh season, gave a choral and orchestral concert at the Lopping Hall on February 11, the chief works being Percy Fletcher's Fantasia on Welsh Airs, C. F. Noyes's 'The Village Blacksmith,' and a Fantasia on Plantation Songs arranged by Stanford Robinson. Mr. Henry Riding conducted.

'Hiawatha' was performed by Harrow and Greenhill Choral Society (Mr. F. W. Belchamber), and by the Plumstead Central Hall Choral Society (Mr. W. Wilson).

Orchestral activities in the suburbs have included the following: The Northern Symphony Orchestra (Mr. Harry King), Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony; Wanstead Choral and Orchestral Society (Mr. Leslie Regan), Vaughan Williams's 'Fantasia on a Theme by Tallis,' and a Suite by William Boyce; South London Philharmonic Society (Mr. Frank Greenfield), Schubert's seventh Symphony and the 'Emperor' Concerto, played by Mr. Leslie England (the choir sang Franck's 150th Psalm); and the Ilford Amateur Orchestral Society (Mr. Frank Winter) giving their first concert on February 21—the first movement from Beethoven's fifth Symphony, the 'Egmont' Overture, and 'Finlandia.'

Music in the Provinces

Bath.—In the course of their round of visits Sir Dan Godfrey and the Bournemouth Municipal Orchestra came to Bath on February 22 and shared a concert with Mr. Jan Hurst and his Pump Room Orchestra. A well chosen programme included Edward German's 'Welsh Rhapsody' and Vaughan Williams's 'The Lark Ascending,' played by Miss Marie Hall, who was on tour with the Bournemouth Orchestra.——Brahms's second Symphony was conducted by Mr. Hurst at the concert on March 6.

Bedford.—The new abridged and simplified version of 'Belshazzar' was performed on February 19 by the Bedford Choral Society under Mr. A. F. Parris. The principals were Miss Dorothy Bennett, Mrs. Coltman, Mr. Walter Glynn, and Mr. Frank Phillips.

Birmingham.—Two of the City Orchestra's recent concerts were of more than usual interest. The programme on February 14 consisted of Joachim's 'Comedy Overture,' Busoni's 'Indian Fantasy,' Liszt's 'Danse Macabre,' Debussy's 'La Mer,' Franck's Symphonic Variations, and Harty's 'With the Wild Geese.' The solo pianist was Mr. Egon Petri. At the concert on March 7 Mahler's fourth Symphony ('A child's view of Heaven') was performed under Dr. Boult, and made, it appears, a distinctly weaker impression than when it was first played at Birmingham two years ago. The song that forms the fourth movement was sung by Miss Dorothy Silk, who also gave two Bach arias. The other music was Pfitzner's Overture 'Christ-Elflein' and Elgar's 'Introduction and Allegro.'——W. H. Reed's 'The Lincoln Imp' and 'Æsop's Fables' were performed under the composer's direction at the West-end Cinema concert on February 17. A week later Mr. Paul Beard, leader of the orchestra and hitherto known to Birmingham concert-goers as a distinguished violin soloist, appeared in the rôle of conductor. His programme included Beethoven's second Symphony. On March 3 Bax's 'Mediterranean' was played.——A week later two novelties were in the programme: a 'Spring Idyll,' by Orsmond Anderton, introducing 'Sumer is a-cumin in,' and a tone-poem entitled 'Bethlehem,' by Alexis Gunning.——'Skye,' a tone-poem by Mr. Stanley Wilson, and a choral setting by James Ching of Whitman's 'Ode to Death,' were performed on March 9 by the local radio forces under Mr. Joseph Lewis.——Franck's Quintet and Brahms's Sextet were recently played at the Philharmonic mid-day concerts.——Among the most interesting of recent recitals was that given by Mr. Leslie Bennett, whose songs included a group by John Ireland, with Mr. Paul Beard and Mr. Hubert Foss, who played Elgar's Violin Sonata and other modern pieces.

Bolton.—Beethoven's Quartet in G, Op. 18, No. 2, and Mozart's Quartet in C, No. 17, were played by the Alfred Barker String Quartet at a concert given by the Musical Artists' Association on February 16. Several hundred school-children were in the audience.

Bournemouth.—A notice of Mr. Rutland Boughton's new ballet will be found on p. 357.

Bradford.—At the third birthday of the Philharmonic Sunday Concerts Mr. Keith Douglas conducted Franck's Symphony and his own 'Overture to a Comedy.' Madame Suggia played Saint-Saëns's Concerto and publicly carved a large birthday cake for distribution to subscribers, and Mr. Douglas was presented with a portrait of himself by William Rothenstein.——The Hallé Orchestra paid a visit on March 8 and played, under Sir Hamilton Harty, the following programme: the 'Eroica' Symphony, the Suite from Kodály's 'Hary Janos,' a Vivaldi Concerto Grosso, Butterworth's 'The Banks of Green Willow,' and the Theme and Variations from Tchaikovsky's third Suite.

Brighton.—The Brighton and Hove Harmonic Society gave 'A Tale of Old Japan' on February 13, under the direction of Mr. Percy Taylor.

Bristol.—Debussy's 'The Blessed Damozel' and Holst's 'Psalm 148' were the chief works performed by the Bristol University Women's Choir under Mr. Arthur S. Warrell on February 14. The other works in the programme included Harvey Grace's 'Pioneers' and McLeod's 'The Snow.' A small orchestra played Warlock's 'Serenade.'——In every season of the Bristol Philharmonic Society one programme is devoted to unaccompanied choral singing. On February 16 the choir, conducted by Mr. Arnold Barter, gave Palestrina's 'Stabat Mater,' Bantock's 'A Pageant of Human Life,' Purcell's 'Soul of the World,' and 'Great God of Love.'——Franck's Quartet and Brahms's Pianoforte Quintet have been heard at the Clifton Chamber Concerts, and the Léners were joined by Mr. Charles Draper in Mozart's Clarinet Quintet.

Cheltenham.—At the last of the orchestral concerts at the Town Hall Dr. Boult conducted the Birmingham Orchestra in Bach's Overture in B minor for flute and strings, Holst's 'Beni Mora,' Debussy's 'L'après-midi,' and Elgar's 'Cockaigne' Overture.——At the municipal concert given with the assistance of the Orchestral Society and the new Bach Choir, on March 10, the works performed by the choir included Parry's 'Ode to Music,' three of Elgar's Bavarian Dances, Franck's 150th Psalm, and, for female voices, Lloyd's 'Man o' Dreams' and Bridge's 'Hence, care.' Mr. Philip J. Taylor conducted.

Clare.—The annual concert of the Clare Choral Society consisted of a successful performance of 'King Olaf,' under the direction of Mr. Percy Hallam.

Derby.—At the fourth and last of the excellent series of chamber concerts in the Central Hall the Virtuoso Quartet was joined by Mr. Henry Mortimer in Mozart's Clarinet Quintet, and Mr. Albert Sammons and Mr. Gordon Bryan in Chaussôn's Concerto in D.

Diss.—The Choral Society, which celebrates its centenary next year, gave a performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius' on March 12, under Mr. W. H. Aldrich, with Miss Mary Sheridan, Mr. Ernest Hargreaves, and Mr. Walter Saull as soloists.

Eastbourne.—Sir Dan Godfrey and the Bournemouth Municipal Orchestra joined forces with Capt. Amers and the Eastbourne Orchestra on February 20 in an interesting list of works, among which were the two short orchestral pieces by Delius, 'The Fire-Bird' Suite, and Vaughan Williams's 'The Lark Ascending,' played by Miss Marie Hall.

Folkestone.—Bournemouth Municipal Orchestra was here on the day preceding its visit to Eastbourne, and Mr. Eldridge Newman, with his Folkestone orchestra, shared the programme with Sir Dan Godfrey. On this occasion Miss Marie Hall played not 'The Lark Ascending,' as in other towns, but Saint-Saëns's Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso.

Grimsby.—The Grimsby Orchestral Society and the Leeds Symphony Orchestra joined forces at the Strand Theatre on March 8 to play Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony, under the direction of Dr. J. Williamson.

Guildford.—The twenty-first series of orchestral subscription concerts came to an end on March 5 with a programme, under the direction of Mr. Claud Powell, that included Gatty's 'Haslemere Suite' and Arensky's 'Variations on a Theme by Tchaikovsky.'

Halifax.—Mr. Shepley conducted the Madrigal Society on February 28 in Wilbye's 'Sweet honey-sucking bees,' Parry's 'There is an old belief,' Elgar's 'There is sweet music,' and other numbers in a characteristic programme.——The Choral Society gave 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast' under Dr. A. C. Tysoe on March 7, with the assistance of the full Leeds Symphony Orchestra.

Hanley.—The programme of the joint concert given by the North Staffs Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. John Cope, and the Potteries Choral Society, under Mr. Carl Oliver, on Sunday, February 24, included Mendelssohn's G minor Pianoforte Concerto (played by Mr. Leonard J. Bowring), the 'Egmont' Overture, Elgar's 'The Shower,' Idle's 'Come live with me,' and Cruickshank's 'Stars of the summer night.'

Hartlepool.—The principal works played by the Hartlepools Symphony Orchestra on March 6, under Mr. J. F. Chalmers Park, were the 'Anacreon' Overture, Franck's Symphonic Variations, Quilter's 'Children's Overture,' and the 'Surprise' Symphony.

Hastings.—Here, on February 18, began the round of visits paid by Sir Dan Godfrey and the Bournemouth Municipal Orchestra to the chief musical towns of the south. Two concerts were given on this day; the first by the Bournemouth Orchestra alone, the second by the combined Bournemouth and Hastings Orchestras and their two conductors. Among the principal works performed (on this occasion and in the course of the tour) were the 'Bartered Bride' Overture, two movements from the 'Fire-Bird' Suite, and Vaughan Williams's 'The Lark Ascending,' played by Miss Marie Hall.——On February 23 Mr. Cameron and his orchestra, assisted by thirty players from the London Philharmonic, played Brahms's third Symphony and Goossens's 'Sinfonietta,' which were the principal works in Mr. Cameron's recent Philharmonic programme in London.

Hereford.—The Hereford Orchestral Society chose an interesting programme for its annual concert on February 11. Mrs. Percy Hull played Schumann's 'Concertstück,' the Symphony was Mozart's 'Jupiter,' and other items were Vaughan Williams's 'Charterhouse Suite,' a Rigaudon by Rameau, and York Bowen's Suite 'At the Play'; Dr. Percy Hull conducted. The programme was repeated the following afternoon.

Huddersfield.—Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' was the principal work in the concert given on February 23 by the Huddersfield Philharmonic Society and the Vocal Union under Mr. J. Fletcher Sykes.——Sir Henry Coward's Huddersfield Choral Society renewed its reputation as one of the finest Handelian choirs in the country by singing a long selection of choruses from 'Israel in Egypt' on March 1. Cliffe's 'Ode to the North-West Wind' was also in the programme.

Hull.—The concert given by the Hull Ladies' Musical Union on February 21 was made the occasion for celebrating Miss Eleanor Coward's jubilee. She was presented with a silver bowl, which is to stand as a prize in the girls' choir class in the Hull competition Festival.

Ipswich.—The Brosa Quartet played Dvorák (the 'Nigger') and Beethoven (Op. 18, No. 6) at the last of the Municipal Concerts on February 14.

Leeds.—Vaughan Williams's 'Sea Symphony' is probably better known at Leeds than anywhere else, for it has now been performed twice by each of the three chief choral organizations in the city. The composer himself conducted the performance by the Choral Union and the Symphony Orchestra on February 13, when his 'Five Mystical Songs' were also given. The principals were Miss Elsie Suddaby and Mr. Harold Williams.——'Acis and Galatea' and Holst's 'Two Psalms' were performed by the University Musical Society under Mr. J. L. Slater, with the assistance of Mr. Maude's String Orchestra.——This orchestra gave two concerts on February 23. In the afternoon they played Bach; the evening programme contained a Suite from Blow's 'Venus and Adonis,' a Concerto Grosso, two movements from a Serenade by Suk, Elgar's Serenade for strings, the Polka from 'Les Vendredis' and a 'Romance' for pianoforte and orchestra composed and played by Mr. J. Jamieson Blair. The conducting was shared by Mr. Maude and Mr. J. F. Chalmers Park. At the Ladies' Symphony Orchestra concert, under Mr. Julius Harrison, on March 2, the principal works were Berlioz's Overture 'The Corsair,' Sir Henry Wood's Bach Suite, and Beethoven's eighth Symphony.——The Leeds New Choral Society, conducted by Mr. H. Bardgett, was accompanied by the Leeds Symphony Orchestra on March 13 in Walford Davies's 'Three Jovial Huntsmen,' 'Acis and Galatea,' and Parry's 'The Pied Piper of Hamélin.'——Brahms's Clarinet Quintet was played by Mr. Harry Mortimer and the Yorkshire String Quartet at one of the Bohemian Chamber Concerts.

Liverpool.—The principal works in the Philharmonic Society's programme on February 12 were Chabrier's Overture 'Gwendoline,' Schumann's fourth Symphony, Reger's 'Romantic Suite,' and Enesco's Rhapsody in A. The conductor was M. Monteux. At the next concert Sir Hamilton Harty conducted Berlioz's 'Harold in Italy,' with Mr. Frank Park as viola soloist, and Mozart's Bassoon Concerto was played by Mr. Archie Camden.

Manchester.—The main features of Hallé Concerts have been as follows: (February 14) Beethoven's first Symphony, Franck's Symphony, and Tchaikovsky's Fourth; (February 21) Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Haydn's Pianoforte Concerto in F (played by Mr. William Murdoch), Respighi's 'The Fountains of Rome,' Pierné's Concertstück for harp and orchestra (played by Mr. Charles Collier), Tchaikovsky's 'Francesca da Rimini'; (February 28) Butterworth's 'The Banks of Green Willow,' a 'Cello Concerto made (and played) by Mr. Cassado out of a Schubert sonata, Dvorák's Symphonic Variations on an Original Theme, and a new Suite by Sir Hamilton Harty for 'cello and pianoforte; (March 7) the 'Eroica' and Brahms's fourth Symphony.——The Glasgow Orpheus Choir, under Mr. Roberton, gave a concert on February 17 in Free Trade Hall.——Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet was played by Mr. Frank Merrick and the Alfred Barker Quartet at a Tuesday mid-day concert.——Some twenty songs by Mr. George Whitaker, of Rochdale, were sung by Mr. Wilfred Firth, accompanied by the composer, at the Memorial Hall on February 15.——The principal visitors have been Kreisler and Gerhardt.

Middlesbrough.—A varied programme was carried out in good style by the Musical Union on March 13. Mr. Gavin Kay conducted the 'Fidelio' Overture and 'The Music-Makers,' in which Miss Millicent Russell sang the solo, and handed the baton to Mr. Maurice Besly, whose choral pieces and songs formed the remainder of the programme.

Newcastle.—At the last of the Philharmonic Concerts, on March 3, Mr. Bainton conducted the third 'Leonora' Overture and Franck's 'Le Chausseur Maudit,' and Miss Kathleen Long played the D minor Concerto of Mozart.——The Hungarian Quartet played a work by Kodály at the final concert of the Chamber Music Society.——The Armstrong College Choral and Orchestral Societies held their jubilee concert on March 9. Dr. Whittaker directed the combined forces in 'Blest Pair of Sirens' and a Cantata,' In Praise of Bach,' arranged by Mr. Steuart Wilson. Prof. C. Sanford Terry, returning to his old post for the moment, conducted the choir in his 'Salve Boreale Lumen.' A fine performance of Brahms's B flat Pianoforte Concerto was given by Dr. J. A. Wilcken and the orchestra.

Newmarket.—The Musical Society, conducted by Mr. Hubert S. Middleton, of Ely, gave Charles Wood's 'Ballad of Dundee,' and, with two pianofortes for accompaniment, 'A Tale of Old Japan.'

Norwich.—At the last of the Municipal Concerts, under Mr. Maddern Williams, twelve pieces were sung by a choir of three hundred elementary school children, who were afterwards provided by the Round Table Club with coffee and biscuits.——A Haydn Symphony and the 'Enigma' Variations were played under Dr. Heathcote Statham at the third concert of the Philharmonic Society. Dr. Ernest Bullock played Handel's fifth Organ Concerto and Bach's C minor Fantasia and Fugue, after which the Fugue was played by the orchestra in Elgar's arrangement.——A programme of great enterprise was chosen by the Norwich Chamber Orchestra and St. Mary's Choir for their concert under Mr. Cyril Pearce's direction on March 14. The orchestral pieces were a string Sinfonietta in D, by Mozart, Bach's three-pianoforte Concerto, Bloch's Concerto Grosso for pianoforte and strings (played by Mrs. N. Black), and Grainger's 'Handel in the Strand.' The choir sang, among other things, three of Parry's 'Songs of Farewell.'

Oxford.—The Mass in B minor was sung by the choir in the Sheldonian on February 16. Dr. W. H. Harris conducted the choir for the first time in this work, and Sir Hugh Allen played the continuo. Mr. W. K. Stanton was at the organ, and the solo singers were Miss Elsie Suddaby, Miss Joan Elwes, Mr. Steuart Wilson, and Mr. Keith Falkner.——'Dusk to Dawn,' a work in which four poems by 'A. E.' have been set to music by the Rev. T. H. Croxall, was performed under the composer's direction by the St. Aldate's Choral Society on February 12.——The Eglesfield Music Society performed Brahms's 'Requiem' under Mr. Reginald Jacques on March 3, with Miss Alice Moxon and Mr. Stuart Robertson as soloists.——Mr. Crawford McNair conducted, and Mr. W. H. Reed led the orchestra at the Town Hall on February 23 in a programme that included Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto, played by Miss Renée Sweetland.——Oxford Orchestral Society gave its first concert on March 1, and played, under the direction of Mr. Reginald Jacques, the first movement of the 'Unfinished' Symphony, Holst's 'Marching Song,' extracts from de Falla's 'El Amor Brujo,' and the 'Egmont' Overture.——At the Town Hall, on March 7, the London Symphony Orchestra was conducted by Sir Hugh Allen in Brahms's fourth Symphony, Delius's 'Brigg Fair,' and, with the composer as pianist, a Concerto by Prof. Donald Tovey.——The Tudor Singers gave a programme of madrigals and modern part-songs on February 24.

Plymouth.—'The early Spring sun,' a new work for solo, chorus, and orchestra by Dr. Harold Lake, was performed by the Plymouth Madrigal Society on February 27, and was well received. The soprano solo was sung by Miss Caroline Hatchard. Dr. Lake's orchestral symphonic poem 'Paphnutius' was also in the programme.

Reading.—A successful concert was given by the Reading University Orchestra in February under Mr. W. K. Stanton's direction. The principal works were Mozart's G minor Symphony and D minor Pianoforte Concerto, and Beethoven's eighth Symphony. ——In the course of their tour Sir Dan Godfrey and the Bournemouth Orchestra came to the Town Hall on February 21.

Salisbury.—The Musical Society, conducted by Miss Nellie Harding, gave its annual concert of music for string orchestra before a crowded audience on February 12. Among the works played were Bach's Concerto No. 7, in G, Arensky's Variations (Op. 35), and Scottish airs, arranged by Holst.

Sheffield.—At the Foxon Five-o'clock Concert on February 20, the Hungarian Quartet played Bartók's first Quartet and that of Franck. ——Vaughan Williams's 'Toward the Unknown Region' was the chief work performed by the University Musical Society on February 28, under Prof. F. H. Shera. The orchestral pieces included Boyce's first Symphony, Warlock's 'Serenade,' Howells's 'Puck's Minuet,' and Mozart's A major Pianoforte Concerto, played by Mrs. J. B. Leathes.

Tunbridge Wells.—Under the direction of Mr. Ernest F. Harding the St. Cecilia choir and orchestra gave successful performances of 'A Tale of Old Japan' and 'The Black Knight,' on February 19.——The tour of Sir Dan Godfrey and the Bournemouth Orchestra brought them to the Opera House on the same date. ——The programme given by the Royal Tunbridge Wells Symphony Orchestra a few days later included Vaughan Williams's 'Charterhouse' Suite, Dunhill's 'Chiddingfold' Suite, Bach's Suite in B minor for flute and strings, and Mozart's 'Kleine Nachtmusik.'

Walsall.—The Philharmonic Society gave a highly creditable performance of 'The Golden Legend' on March 7. Mr. Ambrose Porter conducted, and the principals were Miss May Huxley, Miss Mary Foster, Mr. Trefor Jones, and Mr. Harold Williams.

Weston-super-Mare.—'A Tale of Old Japan' and 'From the Bavarian Highlands' were performed under Mr. Seymour Dossor at the Choral Society's annual concert, on March 11.

Windsor and Eton.—The third 'Leonora' Overture and the 'New World' Symphony were the chief works given by the Orchestral Society at the Royal Albert Institute. Mr. M. Courtenay Boyle conducted.—— 'St. Paul' was given by the Choral Society in Eton College Chapel on March 11, under the direction of the Rev. Bernard Everett, with Dr. Ley at the organ.

Wolverton.—The Science and Art Institute Choral Society gave 'Hear my Prayer' and 'The Golden Legend' recently, under the direction of Mr. C. K. Garratt. The orchestra—of amateurs with professional help—numbered twenty-six, and the choir over a hundred.

Worcester.—The programme of the Festival Choral Society's second concert included Alexander Brent-Smith's Choral Dances for chorus and orchestra, performed for the first time at Worcester, a Scarlatti Suite arranged for strings by Julius Harrison, a Suite by Purcell, and Schubert's 'Great is Jehovah.' Sir Ivor Atkins conducted throughout.

York.—Dr. Bairstow conducted a highly successful Elgar concert by the Musical Society on March 8, the works performed being 'The Music-Makers' and the 'Enigma' Variations. Miss Astra Desmond was the soloist.——A programme of madrigals and part-songs given by the Old Priory Choir under Mr. J. H. Forster, on March 13, included 'Sweet honey-sucking bees,' Bairstow's 'Where shall the lover rest,' 'Weary wind of the west,' and Wood's 'Full fathom five.'

CHANGES AT BOURNEMOUTH

The removal of Sir Dan Godfrey and the Bournemouth Municipal Orchestra from the Winter Gardens to the town's handsome new rendezvous on the sea front marks the close of a long and eventful period in history of British musical enterprise; and, it is the devoutly hoped, the beginning of an era no less crowded with useful activities.

It was in 1893 that the Corporation leased the Winter Gardens and opened the place as a temple of music. Succeeding years saw the acoustics of the hall improved to such an extent as to satisfy the most fastidious of visiting musicians, Paderewski included; but the problem presented by draughts proved more obstinate.

In the later '70's (to go back for a moment to times comparatively ancient) Bournemouth's musical needs were catered for by a band of sixteen Italian ex-army men, expenses being defrayed by public subscription. The first Corporation Military Band came into existence in 1892. Got together by Signor Bertini, this appreciated combination numbered twenty-one performers. Early in 1893 Sir (then Mr.) Dan Godfrey—son of the Dan Godfrey of Grenadier Guards fame—came on the scene, and provided the town with a band thirty strong. The following summer Mr. Godfrey became musical director to the Bournemouth Corporation, and, incidentally, as he remarks in his entertaining 'Music and Memories,' conductor of 'the first actual permanent municipal orchestra formed in the United Kingdom.' During the winter of 1894-95, classical concerts were given on Tuesday afternoons, paving the way for the town's well-known symphony concerts, which are now nearing the end of their thirty-fourth season.

'Celebrity' visits and return visits have occurred with almost bewildering frequency within the past decade. During the Easter Festival of 1922, for instance—the first event of its kind in all the history of British music to be organized by a municipality—over a dozen British composers came and conducted works of their own, and fourteen British artists contributed to the programmes. In the following year's five-weeks' Festival a hundred and fifty-seven different works were performed, ninety-three being British and representing fifty-five composers, twenty-one of whom handled the baton. Of the fifty-one artists engaged—twenty-eight vocalists and twenty-three solo instrumentalists—all but three were of British nationality. Besides encouraging native talent in this way, Bournemouth has done much towards fostering a healthy, intelligent interest in the foreign classics. The four great Symphonies of Brahms, it may be mentioned by way of evidence, have been played regularly season after season.

As recently as the beginning of March of this year, Mr. Rutland Boughton, in conversation with the present writer—just after the production of his startling new 'May Day' Ballet Suite—expressed warm gratitude to Sir Dan Godfrey and the Bournemouth Municipal Orchestra. A few days before, Sir Thomas Beecham was reminding another audience at the Winter Gardens of Bournemouth's musical prestige. 'During the last thirty years,' he declared, 'it has provided more music, and its orchestra has played more music, and your very eminent conductor has produced more music, than any other musician in this country or any other country that I know.' Referring to 'these concerts, with their astonishing wealth of répertoire and selection of music,' he uttered the warning that, if they cease, 'it will be a blow from which the prestige of this town will never recover.'

Meanwhile, the new Pavilion's general-manager, Mr. C. T. Hutchison—who comes from Blackpool—assures us that it is his desire, as also the Corporation's, to enhance, if possible, the reputation of the Municipal Orchestra. The services of Sir Dan Godfrey (as director of the orchestra) and his forty-odd musicians are being retained; the Thursday symphony concerts are to continue, as well as the lighter orchestral fare which the versatile combination dispenses so delightfully. Conductor and players certainly find themselves in surroundings vastly different from those to which for so long they have been accustomed. They now occupy a stage replete with up-to-date accessories, and in a most luxuriously appointed concert-hall. If it be thought well to make Tchaikovsky's '1812' even more thrilling than usual, lighting effects are there to work the trick. An organ has been installed, with Mr. Philip Dore (from Portsmouth) in charge. Whatever the music of the moment may be—a stupendous Symphony by Brahms or a bunch of tunes from the sprightliest of sprightly operas—the audience are not likely to listen less intently because they happen to be comfortably housed and seated.

THE NEW PAVILION

The new Pavilion, which has cost practically a quarter of a million, was opened on Tuesday, March 19, by H.R.H. The Duke of Gloucester.

'It is evidently intended,' His Royal Highness observed, 'to serve two purposes: (1) as a home for music, for which you are so famous, and of which you are so justly proud; and (2) for the less artistic, but still essential purpose of catering for the more material necessities of residents and visitors—for it is intended to provide for both mind and body.'

The afternoon's gala programme in the sumptuous concert-hall afforded a pretty clear indication, apparently, of the lines along which future entertainments, as a whole, are to be run. Up to the mid-way interval, Sir Dan Godfrey and the Municipal Orchestra occupied the stage; presenting a scheme comprehensive enough, and musical enough, to range from the 'Tannhäuser' Overture to a selection from 'Merrie England,' with 'Show Boat' extracts as a further concession to popular taste. They also accompanied Mr. W. H. Squire's three charming solos on the 'cello.

Later on, when Mr. Philip Dore had demonstrated the capabilities of the up-to-date organ pretty convincingly, orchestral music emerged from a lower level, as in most theatres, the while a sprightly danseuse, a Welsh prima-donna, a couple of Co-optimists, and a trick cyclist acquitted themselves in turn.

What might be regarded as stronger meat, from the musical point of view, was forthcoming two days later, in the shape of the twenty-third Symphony concert of the thirty-fourth winter series; and Mr. John McCormack, the tenor, was engaged for the Saturday matinée.

BOUGHTON'S 'MAY-DAY'

A new orchestral work by Rutland Boughton was played for the first time at Bournemouth on Saturday, March 2, under the composer's direction. Described as a 'Ballet for Full Orchestra,' and entitled 'May-Day,' it is a suite of eighteen movements in dance rhythms, portraying the political idea of the overthrow of the capitalist régime of machine production. It is not possible to preach a political any more than a religious sermon in mere notes, but just as some arrangements of notes are appropriate to religious words, so Mr. Boughton's rhythms would be an apt accompaniment to a dance portraying a Karl Marx-William Morris revolution. Indeed, this ingenious aptitude is the strong point of the work, which begins with a representation of the industrial background of machinery in a slow and rigid three in a bar, which is followed by a gavotte indicating the Gay Times, and a waltz illustrating the Luxurious Times, leading up to dances in which machinery is swept away and the nations dance to a healthy Meistersingerish kind of tune. After the crisis which takes place to a military march, a May-Day carol is sung (these are the only words in the piece), and the Finale shows the new joy of work which will animate the world when 'wage-slavery' is no more.

The thematic material is, on the whole, strong, and some quite good use is made of quoted tunes, such as 'La Marseillaise' and 'The Red Flag.' But the work is too drab in colour for its title; there is too little sunlight in the scoring; the writing for wind, in particular, makes no use of the peculiar character of each instrument; and they all sound very much alike and too low in pitch; so that the score loses in transparency more than it gains in dynamic intensity. More vivid scoring, especially in the absence of dancers, would have given a greater impression of contrast, which is essential in a work lasting half an hour and depending largely for its structure on non-musical ideas.

SALISBURY MUSICAL SOCIETY

This flourishing organization, which we believe owes its inception to Dr. W. G. Alcock, continued its policy of tackling large-scale works with a performance of 'Gerontius,' in the Cathedral, on March 13. The choir was augmented for the occasion by a contingent from the Southampton Philharmonic Society and the Cathedral Choir, the total number of voices being about two hundred and twenty. The orchestra was the London Symphony, and the soloists were Miss Margaret Balfour, Mr. Steuart Wilson, and Mr. Herbert Heyner, the last-named taking the place of Mr. Horace Stevens, absent through indisposition. Mr. Arnold Greir was at the organ, and Dr. Alcock of course conducted. It is no derogation to the excellent cast of soloists to say that on an occasion of this kind, taking place in a district until recently not remarkable for choral activity, the work of the choir was the most important factor. On all sides it seems to be agreed that the choral singing reached a very high standard, and one well beyond anything so far achieved by the Society. Beautiful pianissimo singing was there, notably in the 'Kyrie eleison,' and at the other end of the scale there was thrilling fortissimo in such moments of climax as 'Praise to the Holiest' and 'Go forth!' Nor did the technical difficulties of the Chorus of Demons find the choir wanting. Dr. Alcock has earned the gratitude of this part of the country for having produced in a few years such a fine Festival chorus. The Cathedral was full, and the measure of appreciation of the performance is shown by the fact that there was a collection of £175, in addition to private donations.

PORTSMOUTH MUSICAL FESTIVAL

This four-days' Festival, which it is hoped will become an annual event, began on February 27. The chief choral works were 'The Dream of Gerontius,' Holst's 'Hymn of Jesus,' and 'Elijah.' On Friday an orchestral concert was given, with Miss Labbette as the vocal soloist. The orchestral side was a richly-varied scheme, with the 'Enigma' Variations, Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony, Berlioz's 'Fantastic' Symphony, Quilter's 'Children's Overture,' Delius's 'On hearing the first cuckoo in Spring,' Goossens's 'By the Tarn,' &c. The choir is a comparatively new body, but despite this fact, and the ravages of influenza, it made an excellent debut. More tenors and basses are needed, however. No doubt the success of the first Festival will bring accessions to the ranks. There was a long and strong team of soloists, for whose names we have no space. It is good to note that the admirable orchestra was very largely local. At the close of the Festival the Lord Mayor and others joined in warmly eulogising the work of all concerned, especially that of Lieut. R. P. O'Donnell, the hon. conductor.

OXFORD FESTIVAL OPERA COMPANY

A new opera company is being formed by Mr. Robert Stuart, the founder of the Oxford University Opera Club, to be known as 'The Oxford Festival Opera Company.' It will give short seasons of opera in English, in London, and when a repertory has been formed it will tour in the provinces visiting, among other cities, Oxford, Cambridge, and Birmingham.

The Oxford Festival Opera Company will start its activities with a week's run of Monteverde's 'Orfeo' in London next January. Mr. Jack Westrup will conduct, Mr. Robert Stuart will produce. The edition of the score which will be used will be that prepared by Mr. Westrup for the Oxford revival of the work in December, 1925, with English translation by Mr. Robert Stuart. The revival in 1925 was the first stage production of the opera in anything approaching completeness since 1607. Two private performances were given at the Royal College of Music in June, 1926, by the Oxford University Opera Club. 'Orfeo' was performed again in 1927 by the Liverpool Repertory Opera Company, and it is to be performed this spring at the Cologne Opera House. The Oxford Festival Opera Company's production in January, 1930, will be the first public production in London. Miss Denne Parker, who created the title-rôle in Granville Bantock's Hebridean opera 'The Seal Woman,' in 1924, is appearing in the double rôle of Musica and Una Messagiera. Miss Parker's reading of these parts was the outstanding feature of the Oxford revival in 1925.

It is intended to make the production a first-rate one, with first-rate English singers in the principal parts. If sufficient backing is forthcoming the work will be given at a West-End theatre. If these productions are well supported by the London public, Mr. Stuart intends to revive in the course of the year 1930 Mozart's 'La Finta Giardiniera,' Gluck's 'Alcestis,' Glinka's 'Russlan and Ludmila,' and Smetana's 'The Bartered Bride.' All of these operas, with the exception of Gluck's 'Alcestis,' will be performed for the first time on any London stage. They will be given in English, and those which are not already available in English are being translated especially for the Oxford Festival Opera Company. The translation of 'The Bartered Bride' of Smetana was made from the Czech by Miss Alice Raleigh for production at Oxford under Sir Hugh Allen in 1915. This production never took place owing to the outbreak of the war. The connection between the 'Oxford Festival Opera Company' and the city or University of Oxford is purely a sentimental one, and there is no official connection between the Festival Opera Company and the University Opera Club.

Music in Scotland

Aberdeen. — The Oratorio Choir (Mr. Willan Swainson, conductor) sang excerpts from Bach's B minor Mass at its final concert, and Elena Gerhardt sang a number of Lieder.——The programme of a concert by the Aberdeen Orchestral Society (conductor, Mr. Alex. Adam) included Mozart's 'Kleine Nachtmusik,' Beethoven's first Symphony, a Handel Concerto Grosso, and excerpts from Bach's Suite in D, No. 2.

Bathgate.—Bathgate and District Choral Union (conductor, Mr. A. G. Peggie) closed its season with a performance of Handel's 'Judas Maccabæus.'——At the annual concert of the Bathgate Orchestral Society (conductor, Mr. F. Angelo Marsden) an orchestral programme of rather a light character was presented.

Dundee.—At the closing concert of the Dundee Select Choir, Mr. Henry Marshall, the veteran conductor, was presented with a wallet of bank-notes in recognition of his long period of service.——Miss Ruth D'Arcy Thompson gave pianoforte recitals at Dundee and St. Andrew's.

Edinburgh.—At a Reid Orchestra Subscription concert Miss Beatrice Harrison played 'cello concertos by Haydn and Delius, and the orchestra, under Prof. Tovey, performed Mozart's Symphony (K. 551) in C major, Weber's 'Freischütz' Overture, Debussy's 'L'après-midi d'un faune,' and Saint-Saëns's 'Le rouet d'Omphale.'——Prof. Tovey's Sunday concerts included a chamber-music programme, comprising Dvorák's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat, Op. 87, and Prof. Tovey's own Pianoforte Quintet in C major, both played by the Scottish Chamber Music Players, an orchestral programme by the Reid Orchestra, comprising Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony, Beethoven's 'Coriolanus' Overture, three Schubert excerpts, and the Schumann Pianoforte Concerto (soloist, Dr. Mary Grierson), and two pianoforte recitals, in the course of which Prof. Tovey played Bach's fourth 'French' Suite, Beethoven's 'Appassionata' and 'Les Adieux' Sonatas, Brahms's 'Paganini' Variations and 'Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Handel,' a Schubert Sonata in G, Op. 78, three 'Lessons,' by Handel, and Mozart's Unfinished Suite in C and Gigue in G. Not the least of the virtues of Prof. Tovey's scheme of Sunday concerts is the amount of relatively unfamiliar music which he thus brings to a public hearing.——The Edinburgh Bach Society arranged a recital by Miss Beatrice Harrison and Prof. Tovey. The programme consisted of the Sonatas in G minor and D major for 'cello and pianoforte, the Suite in G for 'cello solo, and the Pianoforte Partita in E minor.——The recently formed Edinburgh Opera Club made a first appearance in Mozart's 'Il Seraglio.' Mr. R. de la Haye conducted.——Mrs. Kennedy Fraser, with the co-operation of her daughter, Miss Patuffa Kennedy Fraser, and her sister, Miss Margaret Kennedy, gave one of her unique recitals of 'Songs of the Hebrides.'——The Scottish String Quartet finished its season of informal musical evenings with a plébiscite programme, the works chosen for rehearing being Haydn's 'Emperor' Quartet, Tchaikovsky's D major Quartet, Op. 11, and Dvorák's 'Nigger' Quartet.——The North British Railway Musical Association gave a choral concert, Mr. Archibald Russell conducting.——The choir of St. John's Church sang Brahms's 'Requiem,' Mr. Ralph T. Langdon directing.——Mr. Ralph T. Langdon, conductor of the Edinburgh Amateur Orchestral Society, has formulated a scheme for the establishment of a 'Ralph Langdon' Symphony Orchestra for the avowed purpose of extending the orchestral season at Edinburgh by giving six concerts in Usher Hall on Saturday evenings in April and May. Considering the financial difficulties under which the Scottish Orchestra and the Reid Orchestra already work, it is doubtful how far the new project is to be welcomed.——Mr. Robert Head, organist and choirmaster at Richmond Hill, and a Professor at the Royal Military School of Music, Kneller Hall, has been appointed organist and choirmaster at the Cathedral Church of St. Mary, Edinburgh, in succession to the late Dr. T. H. Collinson.

Falkirk.—Falkirk and District Choral Union (conductor, Mr. J. B. P. Kiddie) gave a performance of Handel's 'Judas Maccabæus.'

Galashiels.—At the last of the series of Subscription concerts, a miscellaneous programme was sustained by Miss Dorothy Silk (soprano), Mr. Frank Titterton (tenor), Mr. Dennis Noble (baritone), and Mr. Alfred Sammons (violin).

Glasgow.—The Glasgow Grand Opera Society produced Gluck's 'Orpheus' and Leoncavallo's 'Pagliacci,' Mr. R. Hutton Malcolm conducting.——The most enterprising feature of the Carl Rosa Opera season at Glasgow was the production of Josef Holbrooke's 'Bronwen' and a one-Act opera, 'Thais and Talmaæ,' by Colin Campbell, a Scots composer.——The programme of the Glasgow University Orchestral Society's annual concert (Mr. Michael Diack, jun., conductor) included a Mozart Symphony in E flat (No. 26), an Oboe Concerto in B flat by Handel, Haydn's Violin Concerto No. 2, in G major, Schubert's, 'Rosamunde' Overture and Overture in B flat, and Elgar's two well-known Chansons.——The programme of the chamber concert arranged annually for its members by the Glasgow Society of Organists included the Trios for violin, 'cello, and pianoforte by Beethoven in D and Schubert in B flat.——At an organ recital given by Mr. Erik Chisholm in St. Matthew's U.F. Church, special interest attached to Mr. Chisholm's presentation of his own organ transcriptions of parts of Elgar's 'Falstaff' and Strauss's 'Don Quixote,' Stravinsky's 'Rondes Printanières' (from 'The Rite of Spring'), and de Falla's 'Fisherman's Song.'——Miss Agnes Miller gave a lecture-recital on Schubert under the auspices of the British Music Society.——The Choral Society connected with the Scottish National Academy of Music presented Mendelssohn's 'First Walpurgis Night' and Stanford's 'The Revenge.' Mr. J. W. Sharpe conducted.——Concerts of part-songs, madrigals, &c., were given by St. George's Co-operative Musical Association (conductor, Mr. William Wilson), Mr. Thorpe Davie's Choir, Glasgow Corporation Tramways Choir (conductor, Mr. Wilfred A. Phillips), Glasgow Police Musical Association (conductor, Mr. Thorpe Davie), Shawlands Choral Union (conductor, Mr. Ernest E. Gordon), and Cathcart Choral Union (conductor, Mr. William Nisbet).——The Glasgow Caledonian Strathspey and Reel Society (conductor, Mr. T. Sinclair Rae), with an orchestra a hundred strong, gave its annual concert of Scottish music. ——Mr. John McCormack made a return visit, the occasion being a charity concert.——The Duchess of Montrose gave a musical 'at home' at Buchanan Castle, Drymen, for the purpose of introducing a young Scots tenor, Mr. J. M. Fyfe.

Greenock.—The most interesting feature of the concert given by the Greenock Male-Voice Choir (conductor, Mr. A. J. Gourlay) was Holst's 'Dirge for Two Veterans' for male voices and brass instruments.

Helensburgh.—At the last of the thirty-seventh season of Subscription concerts, the Budapest Trio played Trios for violin, 'cello, and pianoforte by Beethoven, Op. 1, No. 3, in C minor, Schubert, in B flat, and the Spaniard, Turina.

Kirkcaldy.—Kirkcaldy Choral Union, which its conductor, Mr. Charles M. Cowe, Dundee, has brought to a high state of choral efficiency, gave performances of Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' and Elgar's 'King Olaf.'

Kirkintilloch.—Kirkintilloch Male-Voice Choir (conductor, Mr. John Knox) gave a concert of part-songs.

Perth.—Miss Beatrice Harrison ('cello), Miss Isobel Lamond (contralto), and Solomon (pianoforte) appeared at a Max Mossel concert given under the ægis of the Duncan Lecture Trust.——Mr. Richardson's Choral Society (conductor, Mr. Stephen Richardson) gave concert performances of Haydn's 'Spring' and Gounod's 'Faust.'

General.—At the last of the Max Mossel series of Subscription concerts at Glasgow, Edinburgh, Aberdeen, Ayr, Dunfermline, and Bridge-of-Allan, the artists were Solomon (pianoforte), Raya Garbousova ('cello), and Roy Henderson (baritone).

Music in Wales

Bangor.—At the College weekly concert on February 28, an all-English programme included Purcell's 'Golden' Sonata, a Trio Sonata by Boyce, a set of Old English dances arranged for string quartet, and Herbert Howells's Quartet for pianoforte and strings. At the last concert of the term the Orpheus Vocal Club (a choir of students) sang madrigals and part-songs, together with the final section of Purcell's 'Dido and Æneas.' Other items at this concert were Boughton's Trio, 'A Celtic Prelude'; Huré's 'Suite sur des chants Bretons,' and 'Trio-Variations on an Original Theme,' by Hubert Davies.——This year, again, the series of six School Concerts given at University College has been highly successful. The audiences, varying from four hundred to five hundred children, have shown the greatest keenness, and there can be no doubt that much has been done to develop the musical taste of these juveniles, many of whom will later become students at the University.

Cardiff.—The National Orchestra of Wales has been continuing its mid-day and afternoon concerts in the Museum and its Thursday and Saturday evening subscription concerts in the City Hall. It is agreed on all hands that this body has advanced greatly in ensemble and finesse. Sir Henry Wood, who conducted one of the recent concerts, expressed himself as delighted with the progress made. Among the novelties recently introduced are Mahler's Symphony in G, Bruckner's Symphony in E flat, Bridge's 'The Sea,' and Stravinsky's Scherzo Fantastique, as well as works by Ravel and Bartók. On March 7 the orchestra played a new Rhapsody for violin, 'cello, and orchestra by Mr. Kenneth Harding, a promising young composer and a member of the orchestra. The solo parts were played by Mr. Albert Voorsanger (violin) and Mr. Ronald Harding ('cello). The work was well received.——The University College Choral Society celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary by giving four concerts on the afternoons and evenings of March 7 and 9. The choir sang Palestrina's 'Stabat Mater,' Vaughan Williams's Mass in G minor, Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' Parry's 'Ode on the Nativity,' Holst's 'Ode on a Grecian Urn' and 'Ode to Death,' and Dale's 'Before the paling of the Stars.' The orchestra played a Brandenburg Concerto, Mozart's Serenade for strings, and Bach's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, the pianist being Mr. Joseph Morgan. Prof. David Evans conducted throughout. A number of chamber music and smaller items were also included. ——On February 10 the Cardiff Musical Society and National Orchestra of Wales joined in the performance of 'King Olaf,' conducted by Mr. Warwick Braithwaite. ——On March 3 Mr. Herbert Ware's orchestra gave a programme that included the third 'Leonora' Overture. ——Kreisler and the Don Cossacks have visited the city.

Newport.—The enterprise of the Victoria Orchestral Society, a body of forty players conducted by Mr. Arthur E. J. Holland, was well displayed at the Society's annual concert on March 7. The music included four of Dvorák's Slavonic Dances, the 'Hebrides' Overture, and Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony.

Swansea.—On February 21 the Budapest Quartet played Smetana, Beethoven (Op. 131), and Dittersdorf to a meeting of the Swansea Chamber Music Society.

Trealaw.—On March 6 the National Orchestra of Wales paid a visit to one of the distressed mining areas and gave a free concert, where about twelve hundred miners listened with enthusiastic attention to a programme which included the 'Unfinished' Symphony, the third 'Leonora' Overture, the Prelude to 'Tristan and Isolde,' the ballet music from 'Le Cid,' and other items.

Treforest.—On February 27 'The Creation' was given by the Calvary Choral Society under Mr. A. B. Luscombe.

Music in Ireland

Belfast.—On February 8 Mr. E. Godfrey Brown conducted the Philharmonic Society for the hundredth time. The programme rather aptly included 'The Music-Makers,' other works being James Lyon's 'The Warden of the Cinque Ports,' Debussy's 'L'après-midi,' and Haydn's D major 'Cello Concerto (Mlle. Raya Garbousova).——As musical director of the Belfast Station, Mr. Brown conducted the Radio Singers recently in a programme of madrigals. The Radio Ensemble Players assisted at this concert by playing Beethoven and Mozart (the Clarinet Quintet).——The Belfast Choral Union, conducted by Mr. James Graham, contributed part-songs to what was otherwise a Wagner programme, under Capt. C. J. Brennan, at Ulster Hall, on February 23.——At a meeting of the B.M.S. the Winifred Burnet Stringt Quartet played Tchaikovsky, Debussy, and Gerrard Williams.

Cork.—Mozart's Symphony in G minor was the principal work in the programme given by the Cork Philharmonic Society, under Mr. George Brady, on February 6.

Dublin.—The works played under Col. Fritz Brase at the Philharmonic Society's concert on February 9 were Dvorák's 'Carnival' Overture, Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto (Miss Nancy Lord), 'Till Eulenspiegel,' and the 'Eroica.'——The London Wind Quintet gave two recitals for the Royal Dublin Society on March 4.

GERMANY

THE BACH CENTENARY OF THE BERLIN SINGAKADEMIE

There was good occasion for this Festival, for it was in the Berlin Singakademie's own house that the first modern performance of the 'St. Matthew' Passion took place, on March 11, 1829, under Mendelssohn's direction. Apart from the fact that it was just a hundred years before this that the work was first heard at the Leipsic Thomas Church, the date of the occasion is of great importance. Mendelssohn's performance marked the beginning of a new stage of Bach culture—a change from private to public appreciation.

After his death Bach was apparently lost to sight by the new generation, but it is certain that he found at Berlin many private admirers, and it may justly be said that in this city there was no interruption in Bach culture. This was due principally to the fact that two of Bach's sons lived at Berlin, and that there was also a circle of Bach's own pupils, such as Kirnberger, the great musical grammarian, and Agricola, who afterwards became Kapellmeister at the Royal Opera House. So there remained at Berlin a Bach tradition that could not fail to bear fruit in the following generation.

It was with the foundation of the choral institution called the Singakademie that the study of Bach was undertaken systematically. It began in 1794, under Karl Friedrich Christian Fasch, and continued on a larger scale under Karl Friedrich Zelter, a friend of Goethe who had studied Bach under Fasch. It is to the credit of Prof. Georg Schünemann, a well-known musicologist, that Zelter, who had been considered a narrow-minded pedant, has been given his due, and that the great part he took in preparing the first performance of the 'St. Matthew' Passion is now appreciated. After giving close attention to the diaries that existed in the library of the Singakademie, Schünemann came to the conclusion that without Zelter's preparatory work Mendelssohn would never have been enabled to give his performance. No doubt Zelter, who, in his admiration for Bach, still looked upon his music as partly impracticable, did not hesitate to make alterations in it with a view to performance. We now condemn this, but at that time people were less strict in their ideas. The full recognition of Zelter's share in the performance does not detract from Mendelssohn's, for Mendelssohn, both by his knowledge and by his imaginative force, was the only musician fit to render the spirit of Bach adequately, as Zelter clearly recognised.

The Berlin Singakademie signalised the occasion by giving the Passion in its complete form, without the abbreviations and changes by which its features are usually modified. It is, however, open to question whether it is necessary to give a complete performance of the work in order to realise its true effect. When Furtwängler recently gave a very abbreviated version of the Passion, the hearers were deeply moved by the faithful and, at the same time, liberal spirit in which it was done. Before Georg Schumann, the present director of the Singakademie, it was the late Siegfried Ochs who undertook the first unabbreviated performance of the Passion.

ALBERT COATES AT BERLIN

The radio, which plays an important part in Berlin musical life engaged Albert Coates for an orchestral concert in the concert-hall of the Berlin Singakademie. It was planned to give a survey of the most representative British works. The programme consisted of a Purcell Suite arranged by Albert Coates, Elgar's 'Enigma' Variations, and Vaughan Williams's 'London Symphony.' Though no doubt some pieces by the younger generation might have tended to a fuller representation of British creative force in music, the two modern works certainly gave the German public an idea of how the British musical mind acted on the larger scale. They both made an excellent impression on the audience, and this was also in great part due to the effective and lively conducting of Mr. Albert Coates, who, as an interpreter of English music, won the hearty applause of the Berlin public.

DANISH COMPOSERS IN BERLIN

The local group of the International Society for Contemporary Music invited some young Danish composers to give a chamber concert with the assistance of the Chamber-Music Association of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. There is not much to be said on the music presented at this occasion. It is more in the careful handling of the instruments than in richness of musical ideas that its merit lies. The names of Joergen Bentzon, Knudage Riisager, and Finn Hoeffding, however, will remain impressed on the minds of the hearers. It is difficult for Danish composers to find a style of their own amid the world-crisis of music.

HINDEMITH'S ORGAN CONCERTO

The organ is habitually silent at Philharmonic concerts. Hindemith's new Concerto made it change not only its habit but its character. It threw off its solemnity and assumed a style of rather dour pleasantry. The only solemnity was a canon in the second movement. Fritz Heitmann, whose activities as a church organist are highly appreciated, showed himself equal to the new task. The work may be looked upon as a study in linear counterpoint on a new platform.

Adolf Weissmann.

HOLLAND

The performances under Mengelberg, and Dopper deputising for him, of the ninth Symphony of Gustave Mahler, which have taken place at Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and The Hague, have brought us little further in the discussions as to whether it is, as Specht suggests, an effort of a worn-out genius—in which what is said has already been said many times before, and in which the idiom and ornamentation would have been revised had the composer had the time and energy to do it—or whether, as the writer in 'Grove' says, it 'reaches a plane which is surely the highest that Mahler ever attained to.' Personally I am prepared to put both the fourth and the eighth before it; even in technical matters the eighth, with all its length, elaboration, and redundancies, excels it. Its despondency is as great as that of 'Das Lied von der Erde,' but it has more dignity.

Bruckner, whose second Symphony has recently been played by the Residentie Orchestra under Dr. van Anrooy, charms always when he does not tire one with his garrulity. This Symphony has some fine thoughts finely expressed, but it suffers from the general defects of the composer's musical character. Johan Wagenaar's Overture to Shakespeare's 'Twelfth Night' presents some excellent scoring as well as some typical character-drawing, though to my thinking it is one of his less successful orchestral works. Following on somewhat the same conservative lines of thought and technique is a Suite for orchestra by E. Enthoven, a comparatively young man who has not been swamped by modernism and has something to say and the ability to say it.

Paderewski is just paying his first visit to Holland, but his reception, and the appearance of several British artists, are too late for mention this month.

Herbert Antcliffe.

ITALY

At La Scala the only event of outstanding interest has been the first performance here of Ravel's 'L'heure espagnole,' which made its first appearance in Italy some years ago. The work had the misfortune to encounter a good deal of chauvinism. But this was in after-discussion; during the actual performance it seemed to be highly appreciated.

At Rome there has been a revival of that absurd opera 'La Sonnambula'—absurd, that is, in its libretto. How Bellini ever came to lend his great powers to such a subject is a puzzle. Perhaps the only explanation of such mysteries is that poor literary material was used by composers because it expressed, not the intelligence, but the theatrical psychology of the day. We may be sure that it was not due to a lack of personal culture on the part of the composers. The name-part was taken by dal Monte, whom we reported last month as being seriously ill.

Gino Marinuzzi, an Italian conductor who has spent the greater part of his life in America, is the first maestro of the season, with Bavagnoli as substitute. Marinuzzi also produced 'Tristan' at the Royal Opera. Inasmuch as he practically always works from memory, he has the whole panorama of the music in mind, and gives some of the best-balanced performances which can be heard in Italy.

At Naples, after the opening of the renovated San Carlo with Catalani's 'Loreley,' they gave Mascagni's 'Iris,' probably the greatest work of that very prolific composer. The opera and the singers' names were sufficient to sell the house out within a short time of the announcement. Pertile and Pampanini were the principal artists, and Edoardo Vitale conducted.

At Turin the new Giordano opera 'Il Re' and Wolf-Ferrari's 'L'amore medico' were given, both operas meeting with exceptional success.

At Genoa there have been several performances of 'Parsifal,' with Isidoro Fagoaga, quite the finest Wagnerian tenor Italy has to-day. Charles d'If.

VIENNA

OPERA

I have commented before on the lack of novelties in the repertory of the Vienna Opera. This season the situation is positively alarming. With the ten months more than half gone, we record but one work which may be accepted as new in the local sense. It is Henri Rabaud's mildly entertaining opera 'Marouf': a strange choice, for not only is this belated sequel of Massenet's muse a rather weak work, but it is also as unsuitable as Massenet's operas to the big proportions of our Staatsoper building as well as to the vocal style of German singers. The production, by Lothar Wallerstein on the stage and Schalk in the orchestra, sought to atone by beautiful and costly setting for the lack of musical substance and adequate vocal interpretation. This remark is not aimed at the many excellent singers of our ensemble; they are trained, however, for a different operatic style. It was only when José Rogatschewsky, the Paris Opéra-Comique's lyric tenor, appeared as guest in a later performance of Rabaud's piece, that we came to realise fully the requirements of this light French opera: Gallic lightness of singing and acting, and a graceful humour foreign, as a rule, to Teutonically trained singers. Rogatschewsky pleased us, in this and other French rôles, by a voice which, though far from great or even noble in itself, possesses a peculiar charm in its softer tones, however abundantly they may be employed.

'Marouf' appears to be destined for a short career at Vienna, and was not wisely chosen. The next novelty promised us is again a French opera, Ravel's 'L'enfant et les sortilèges.'

IDA RUBINSTEIN'S BALLET

With Rabaud and Rogatschewsky at the Staatsoper, and Ravel soon to arrive there, Vienna is now in the midst of a French season. The short visit of Ida Rubinstein and her ballet thus formed a welcome and logical completion, for notwithstanding the dancer's Russian birth, her troupe was founded at Paris and first presented there. The two Stravinsky ballets which Madame Rubinstein has in her programme were omitted at Vienna, and the six pieces presented in the course of two evenings were: 'La Princesse Cygne,' with music by Rimsky-Korsakov and staged in the vein of the old Russian ballet; 'David,' with rather insignificant music by Henri Sauguet but with a beautiful rôle for Madame Rubinstein as the young biblical hero; 'The Wedding of Psyche and Amor,' a gorgeous baroque spectacle with music which Arthur Honegger orchestrated after Bach; 'Nocturne,' a beautiful vision of choregraphic Spain, with Rubinstein as splendid protagonist; and two that were more important than these—Ravel's 'Boléro' and 'La Valse.' The latter piece we saw with a feeling of mingled pleasure and resignation. Ravel wrote it for Vienna, but Richard Strauss, during his directoral period, preferred to mount his own 'Schlagobers,' and it thus remained for a foreign troupe to bring this Viennese ballet to the Vienna Opera. Nijinska had provided it with marvellous choregraphy. I doubt whether Paris will like it. It is not even Viennese; but it is interesting, daring, and modern in the German sense—'abstract' dancing of the most perfect type.

'Boléro,' the crowning achievement of Ida Rubinstein's troupe, is a stroke of genius—musically, scenically, and choregraphically. A dark Spanish tavern, dimly lit by a big lamp suspended over a huge table; on this enormous table the dancing-girl, surrounded by young men. Seated on low chairs, they follow her enticing movements, stolidly at first, more inflamed later on, and raving at the end, when they join the lovely temptress, knives in hands, in her whirling dance. One huge crescendo in music, dance, and action. The music—one single phrase, repeated over and over again, passing through all instrumental groups, increasing in dynamics to the huge climax; then breathless silence, in a ghostly light.

We saw Diaghilev's Russian Ballet here last season. It was perhaps more 'modern' than most of Ida Rubinstein's répertoire, more experimental. Madame Rubinstein is not inclined to experiments. She seeks beauty in art, not problems. She brought settings and costumes of unprecedented lavishness and great taste (by A. Benois), perfect dancers, beautiful music—most of it written for her own exclusive use. This gifted woman's untiring enthusiasm for art and its ends, her relentless energy and unstilled ambition, compel admiration.

NEW ORCHESTRAL MUSIC

Leopold Reichwein, conductor of the Konzertverein orchestral series, who divides his time between Vienna and Bochum (Germany), has made known to us the new second Symphony by Rudolf Kattnig. This young composer gave good promise in his first symphonic work, and captivated us by a youthful, care-free freshness and spontaneity. Some years have elapsed, but he has not much changed since. The new work contains much melody, some of it good and all of it well constructed according to the accepted forms. Of depth there is little, and equally little of striking novelty or originality.

If time be the test of worth, Alexander Tcherepnin may well be satisfied with the impression created by his first Pianoforte Concerto. It is twelve years old now, and had not been heard at Vienna. That it is still fresh and direct in its appeal should be a source of satisfaction to the composer in his twenty-ninth year. Tcherepnin himself played it with all the barbaric bravura that the brilliant piece demands. It is strongly influenced by the neo-Russian school, while the young author's later works show a mentality more given to experiment and novel combinations. Particularly so in the 'Well-tempered Violoncello,' a really amusing composition in which the composer assisted alternately at the pianoforte and bass-drum.

The Tonkünstler Society continues its struggle for existence, and seeks to solicit public interest by engaging guest-conductors for its series. Hermann Abendroth, from Cologne, gave us an earnest and solid interpretation of Bruckner's eighth Symphony and Te Deum, Josef Rosenstock (a Viennese conductor now active in Germany, and recently engaged for the Metropolitan Opera of New York) returned to his native city with an impressive performance of Mahler's second Symphony. Oscar Nedbal, now operatic-director at Pressburg—so near Vienna yet now part of the Czechoslovak State—returned to the Tonkünstler, where Furtwängler succeeded him several years ago as director. It was good to see the rotund, genial, temperamental man (incidentally a most successful operetta composer) back in his old place. As a novelty he brought us orchestral songs by Max Ast, the Viennese composer who governs the destinies of the Austrian Broadcasting service: finely scored examples of moderately modern lyricism, Straussian in vein, and a welcome gift for the concert singer in quest of grateful new songs.

Richard Strauss himself came to the aid of the Vienna Symphony Orchestra by volunteering his services as conductor for a benefit concert. Surprisingly enough, the public responded most meagrely, the hall remaining but half-full. The contradictory position of Strauss at Vienna—god-like honours from press and society, and small houses whenever he conducts, be it opera or concert—is quite puzzling. Strauss is an ornament on the musical façade of Vienna which many are proud of but few care to behold.

SEA MUSIC FESTIVAL IN VANCOUVER, B.C.

In a programme of six performances, beginning January 23 and ending January 26, with matinées on Wednesday and Saturday, a considerable amount of pride resulted from the fact that so many Canadian artists of outstanding ability had been brought together for the occasion; and the wealth and variety of music that has been written about the sea and the characteristic beauty of the many French-Canadian folk-songs heard during the Festival came as a surprise.

Posterity will certainly owe a debt of gratitude to Dr. Ernest MacMillan and Dr. Healey Willan, of Toronto, for the part they have played in the preservation of French-Canadian folk-music. Their efforts have been and are untiring in the matter of research along these lines.

'At a Lewis Fishing,' written and produced by Miss Ethel Bassin, of Vancouver (who lived for some years in the Hebrides and who has studied Hebridean folk-music at first-hand), presented such a scene as might be seen any fine day on the pier of a Hebridean fishing village; the men engaged in mending their nets, the women knitting with now a song and now a few scraps of every-day conversation to while away the hours.

The cast was remarkable from the fact that it was drawn entirely from natives of the isle of Lewis, who are now residents of Vancouver. Their voices were of a very pleasing full tone, and the whole action was carried out with such apparent enjoyment on the part of the players, who seemed to be utterly oblivious of the existence of the audience, that the result was altogether delightful.

'The Order of Good Cheer,' re-written from the French of Louvigny de Montigny by J. Murray Gibbon and for which the music has been composed by Dr. Willan, needs a few words of explanation for those not familiar with Canadian history.

In the days of Champlain and the garrison at Fort Royal the habitants found that time hung heavily on their hands when they were not engaged in fighting the Indians, so, for their benefit, Champlain founded this Order in the year 1606. It was, in reality, a sort of guild for the organization of some form of definite amusement.

With Dr. Willan, who came from Toronto for the purpose, conducting his own composition, a most finished performance was the result.

'Bound for the Rio Grande,' written and produced by Frederick William Wallace was the closing number of Friday's programme. It presented the deck of a sailing ship, and made liberal use of shanties. Mr. John Goss was a most convincing shanty-man, and was supported by an excellent chorus.

These ballad operas were preceded by musical programmes given by the various artists brought to Vancouver for the Festival—John Goss, Jeanne Dusseau, Poul Bai, Ulysse Paquin (French-Canadian basso), Finlay Campbell, of Ottawa, Glyndwyr Jones, of Calgary, and the Hart House String Quartet, with Geza de Kresz, Harry Adaskin, Milton Blackstone, and Boris Hambourg. Frances James and Herbert Hewetson, who had been heard at the Festival in Victoria, again pleased their audience, and two local artists of repute, Marion Copp, contralto, and Leonard Hayman, tenor, completed the list.

The concluding programmes, Saturday matinée and evening performances, were interesting from a local point of view. The matinée took the form of a children's programme, the main attraction being a choir of over two hundred children's voices and a smaller choir of sea scouts under the direction of Miss Ethel Bassis. The Mary Isdale dancers, already seen in previous programmes, were responsible for several attractive numbers, and a group of five sea scouts from Winnipeg repeated their respective instrumental numbers that had been heard on Thursday with great success.

The evening programme was contributed by the Vancouver Scottish Orchestra, the Welsh Male Choir with Finlay Campbell as soloist in 'Songs of the Fleet,' the North Vancouver Choral Society with Leonard Hayman and Glyndwyr Jones as the soloists in 'The Revenge,' and Ulysse Paquin was again heard in a group of French-Canadian songs.

A word of appreciation should go to Mr. J. Murray Gibbon, who directs the Festivals, and to whose untiring energy their success is largely due; and to Harold Eustace Key, the musical director for the Canadian Pacific Railway, who did a large part of the accompanying.

MUSIC IN RUSSIA

BY A SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT

The development of music and the organization of big concerts has become a matter of State activity in Russia, along with so many other things. Music has become one of the interests of the Chief Art Department, which regulates the life of art in the whole Union of Socialist Soviet Republics.

One minor advantage has been that big concert arrangements in Moscow and other large towns are made so as to avoid any clashing of fixtures. The broadcasting of music has not been left in the hands of the broadcasting organization. The arrangements are made by the Chief Art Department, and special attention is paid to catering for the workers' musical needs, and this work is shared by three large musical institutions, the Soviet Philharmony, the Cultural Section of the Moscow Town Council of Trade Unions, and the First Symphonic Orchestra, without a conductor, called the Persimfans.

The Soviet Philharmony, besides the arrangement of usual symphonic concerts in the town itself, where the best Russian and foreign artists will appear, proposes this year to arrange a series of concerts to take place in the suburbs, in the factories and works, and in the Red Army barracks. For those concerts orchestral and choral societies of various Trade Unions are being trained to take part.

In drawing up musical programmes, not only is consideration paid to the subject-matter of the themes chosen and the respective order in which they are to be performed, but the capacity of the spectator's attention, the degree of fatigue due to music, &c., receive proper attention as well, along with the explanatory remarks with which the concerts are usually accompanied.

Besides the above-mentioned concerts, the Soviet Philharmony intends to produce on the stages of various workers' clubs a series of soirées, dedicated to some particular musical or social theme. The programme of these soirées will be arranged to include educational items. On Sundays it is proposed to produce some matinées. The work of selecting and systematising the programmes will be performed by a specially appointed staff of expert and experienced musicians.

The Persimfans, besides its two series of concerts for subscribers (one of the series starts in October with a concert in which the famous Joseph Szigeti will appear) includes in its plan several concerts in suburban districts.

It is certainly a difficult and novel enterprise to make the anarchical and capricious concert life of a big town subject to a definite and harmonious plan. It is the first experiment of its kind ever made in the world; and even if it does not prove a complete success, even if in the process of its realisation some difficulties arise, its unique importance remains obvious, as it efficiently distributes music among the public, makes a better selection of programmes, and overcomes the traditional inertia in musical performances, the dependency of concerts upon fashion, private taste, and considerations of a financial character.

The cleavage which existed formerly between the professional musicians and the amateurs (members of numerous workers' associations) is now speedily disappearing. The past year has given the workers an opportunity of hearing the music of Beethoven and Schubert along with other classical composers, all of them in the performance of workpeople's orchestras. Even operas were produced unabridged exclusively by the amateurs themselves. Not very long ago, in Dnepropetrovsk, the metallists not only produced the first Symphony of Beethoven but even the ninth (without any abridgment or omissions whatsoever). The said association of workers possesses an excellent choir of two hundred and fifty persons.

It is obvious to an investigator that Russia is taking her musical life in a spirit of dead seriousness and studiousness which is so noticeable in every phase of activity in Russia to-day, and on the whole it may be said that Russia's artists and musical experts are co-operating to make experiments in musical education and organization a thorough success.

SOME MUSICAL INSTRUCTION BOOKS OF THE 17th CENTURY

On December 11, a paper was read before the Musical Association by Mr. H. C. Colles on 'Some Musical Instruction Books of the 17th Century.' The lecturer said that his interest in these was first aroused by a desire to discover what Purcell's share in the most famous of them, Playford's 'Introduction to the Skill of Musick,' had actually been. He did not know then of the researches of the late W. Barclay Squire, and thus he had been led to several points not touched upon by that writer.

The scope of his subject was bounded by the English language, and by the fact of publication in London. The books in question were not works of profound scholarship. They represented in most instances an attempt on the part of various publishers, with the assistance of a number of musicians, to make clear to the masses of more or less ignorant amateurs a few of the first principles of music. They were all elementary. The number of them attested the fact that, in the 17th century, as in the 20th, there were in this country a large number of people susceptible to music but quite uneducated in its technique, and that these people clung almost pathetically to the idea that if only they could get a smattering of knowledge their musical perceptions would be immeasurably quickened. What the B.B.C. did for its subscribers to-day, the authors of these books attempted to convey to their readers three hundred years ago.

Morley's 'Plaine and Easie Introduction to Practicall Musick' (1597) set an heroic example. The authors who followed him delved freely into him. Christopher Sympson copied passages from Morley almost verbatim into his 'Division Violist' (1659), and John Playford's first version of his 'Introduction' (1654-55) was practically a boiling down of the simpler parts of Morley, such as the description of the Gamut and the principles of the scales and of time measurement. First among those to be discussed came the work of Thomas Campion, 'A New Way of making Foure Parts in Counterpoint by a most Familiar and Infallible Rule.' The essence of the new way lay in the calculation of harmonies from the bass. Campion acknowledged that the old way was to weave parts around the tenor, but contended that 'Contrary to some opinions the base contains in it both the aire and true judgment of the key.' Campion was pleading for what we now called the harmonic point of view, in contrast to the older contrapuntal one. He was, in fact, something of a pioneer.

Campion's 'New Way' was incorporated into Playford's 'Introduction to the Skill of Musick,' the most popular work of musical instruction during the latter part of the century. Through its first dozen editions, which ranged from 1654 to that of 1694, which Henry Purcell edited, the book was constantly being repacked with all the things that the publisher considered might be useful to a short sojourner within the borders of music. Playford began with the modest design of issuing a text-book on the elements of music to help the amateur to sing at sight; to this he added some instructions on the bass viol and treble violin, with lessons for beginners, and further he incorporated a reprint of Campion's treatise. At the same time he induced Sympson to annotate Campion, and in at least one place allowed him to tell the reader that if he should find Campion's theory a little difficult to follow at that point, he need not worry very much about it. Playford also drew on a more learned treatise, 'The Principles of Musick' which Dr. Charles Butler had produced in 1636.

From this nucleus, Playford's 'Introduction' was gradually expanded. The third edition (1660) added a collection of two-part songs, but many of these had to be dropped out of later editions to make room for new material. After the third edition, a reprint appeared about every two years, but not always called a new edition. The fourth edition (1664), much enlarged, contained a most interesting new feature in 'A brief discourse of the Italian manner of singing . . . written some years since by an English gentleman, who had lived long in Italy and being returned, taught the same here.' Who was the author was not stated, and no one had been able to guess.

Other additions to the 'Introduction' were more utilitarian. We found a liberal selection of metrical Psalm-tunes for use in parish churches. In the edition of 1679 we found also 'The Order of Performing the Divine Service in Cathedrals and Collegiate Chappels.' This latter was retained up to the eleventh edition (1687). It was omitted from Purcell's edition of 1694, very unfortunately for us, to whom it would have been invaluable to know what Purcell considered to be the due course of Cathedral use.

In the tenth edition, of 1683, the name and work of Campion were dropped and replaced by 'The art of Descant or composing of Music in parts by a more plaine and easie method than any heretofore published.' The title-page attributed the whole work to John Playford himself, and though Playford, the publisher, was only an amateur composer, he might well have felt himself fitted on that very account to explain the matter to other amateurs. There was indeed a distinct advance in the direction of plainness and easiness. The most original part, however, was in 'Several examples of taking discords elegantly.' These showed how far the theory of direct discord in harmony had proceeded away from the standards of the contrapuntal era, and it was probably more for the display of these uses of discord than for anything else that Playford determined to supersede Campion's Rule with what appeared to be his own.

This edition lasted four years, and the eleventh edition (1687), published by Henry Playford after his father's death, was virtually a reprint of it. Then came the famous twelfth edition, of 1694, which Purcell edited, and the major part of his revision was concerned with re-writing the third book, that is to say, this 'Art of Descant,' as it had been left by John Playford.

Purcell left a good many things standing which he had better have altered. He left as much of the description of rudiments as it was possible to leave. He first stepped in to re-write the chapters on Time, because it was necessary to get rid of the archaisms of the Large and the Long, and the description of the mediæval 'Proportions,' perfect and imperfect. In a chapter all his own, he gave a practical common-sense view of Time, reducing it to simplicity by asserting that there were 'but two moods or characters by which time is distinguished, viz., common time and triple time; all other variations and distinctions of time (like so many rivulets) take their original from these two.'

Purcell revised and shortened Playford's list of metrical Psalm-tunes, and wrote new basses for them. The Second Book, concerned with instrumental playing, he left practically untouched. Naturally it was in the Third book, 'The Art of Descant or Plain and Easie Rules for composing Music in two, three, four or more parts,' that Purcell asserted himself most decisively, though not even here to the extent of re-writing the whole treatise.

There soon came a point when the pedestrian method of the earlier work irked him too much for further pursuit of it. The style changed abruptly. Purcell launched out with the remark, 'Formerly they used to compose from the bass, but modern authors compose to the treble when they make counterpoint or basses to tunes or songs.' Just as Campion, at the beginning of the century, had discarded the old practice of composing round a tenor for that of building up from a bass, so Purcell, at the end of it, again changed the view-point, regarding harmony primarily as the process of finding the bass to a given tune. The dicta of Campion and Purcell here together summed up the harmonic evolution of the century. Having stated his general principle, Purcell went on to expound it by taking a four-bar phrase of melody, adding a bass to it, and giving reasons why, in his opinion, every note of his bass was inevitable in view of the progressions of the melody.

After dealing with the harmonic implications of keys with unprecedented clarity, Purcell came next to 'Fugue or Pointing,' and here it was immediately evident that, like all great masters, he found it infinitely easier to write in fugue, canon, and imitation than to teach other people how to do it. Morley in his 'Plaine and Easie Introduction' lost sight of the distinction between the amateur's and the expert musician's requirements. Purcell, in his pages on Fugue, lost sight of the requirements of both. Not having thought out the science of the thing very fully, he fell back on his own practical attainment as an artist. He gave examples not so much of how the thing should be done as of the fact that he could do it supremely well.

Nevertheless, faithful to the long established ideal of missionary enterprise, Henry Playford stated on the title-page of the thirteenth edition (1697) that it contained 'The Art of Descant or composing Musick in parts made very plaine and easie by the late Mr. Henry Purcell.' Thus the 'plain and easy' idea was passed through the three degrees of comparison, positive, comparative, and superlative, in the hundred years from Morley to Purcell, and we were left wondering what the 'young Practitioners' made of it. Unfortunately we could not see the exercises that the young Practitioners wrote on Purcell's models during the thirty years after his death in which his book remained a standard text-book. We could only conjecture. But we could imagine a young Practitioner at work on a fugue per arsin et thesin, cursing the intractability of his subject, and bitterly exclaiming 'Yes, plain and easy enough, if only Purcell were here to write it for me. . .'

THE PERFORMANCE OF MUSIC IN SPAIN

At the meeting of the Musical Association on January 15, Mr. J. B. Trend read a paper on 'The Performance of Music in Spain.' He pointed out that in dealing with the remains of Spanish music the researcher was not confined to musical MSS. or the statements of the theorists. Sculpture, ivories, miniatures, and contemporary descriptions in prose or verse often threw more light on the conditions of performance and the character of the music itself than the actual MS. with the musical notation (supposing such to exist and be intelligible), and they were certainly more illuminating than the theoretical treatises of the philosophers.

It seemed to be a general rule with mediæval music that we knew too much about the theory and too little about the practice. The theorists were often not musicians at all. They were either philosophers, in which case music had to be fitted somehow into their systems; or else they were ecclesiastics, and so were interested in music as a means to an end rather than as an end in itself. Indeed, the abuse of music by moralists, Muslim as well as Christian, often gave valuable information as to what the music was really like. It was important for the researcher to have personal acquaintance with the documents and illustrations of early performances of music, for that enabled him to regard the music to a certain extent from the point of view of the musicians themselves. It was that point of view which he (the lecturer) proposed to maintain, and to that end his illustrations were provided not by living performers and actual sounds, but by lantern-slides showing how music was performed in Spain at different periods from the 10th to the 18th century.

The earliest music in Spain of which written descriptions gave any definite idea was the singing of a Persian musician at Cordoba, in the 9th century. Cordoba under the amirs, and later the caliphs, was the centre of civilization, the centre for music and the arts. All the evidence went to show that the professional musicians at Cordoba were largely recruited from the East, and that the music they sang was Eastern. Ziryab, the most famous singer of the age, came to Cordoba in the time of the amir Abd-ar-Rahman II. (821-852). At Cordoba he established a celebrated school of singing, and the accounts which historians gave of his method were of great interest. He divided his instructions into three courses—rhythm, melody, and ornamentation. Before a pupil was admitted to the school, he had to pass certain tests in voice-production. If the pupil seemed to have the makings of a good voice he was taken. If not, he was sent away.

When it came to the actual teaching of a song, Ziryab's method was something quite new in Spain. Before his time a singing-master would go straight through a song from beginning to end as if he were singing it in public, and the pupils imitated him as best they could. Ziryab altered all that. The pupil began by learning the words and the metre, without the music. He repeated the poetry while he beat time with a tambourine to mark the strong and the weak accents, and the different pace of different movements. Then, when he knew the words, he was taught the melody in its simplest form with no ornaments; and only when he could sing it perfectly was he allowed to study the grace-notes, trills, vocalises, and scale-passages with which the great singer embellished the song and the subtle shades which he introduced to give it expression.

Music was also made among the Spanish Christians, both those who lived in various little independent States in the north and those who lived under the tolerant rule of the Spanish Muslims. They were allowed to sing their church services and even to ring their church bells. Christians living under Muslim rule were known as Mozarabes 'Arabised,' and their form of service was the Mozarabic Rite. To what extent this differed in Christian Spain and Muslim Spain can hardly be determined. There was at any rate a well-defined system of musical notation, though this had not yet been satisfactorily deciphered. Muslim music was very rarely written down, and then only in books of theory.

The most interesting miniatures of musicians of the time were to be found in the Commentary on the Apocalypse of Beatus of Liebana, originally compiled in the 8th century. More than twenty MSS. were known, of which the oldest might be as early as the 9th century. The style of illustration varied with the period.

The Mozarabic Rite seemed to have been general in Spain, in one form or another, until the capture of Toledo by the Christians in 1085. It became then no longer a case of correcting the abuses which had crept into the Church service under Muslim rule, but of adopting a new kind of Church service altogether. The manner in which the change was accomplished hardly seemed like a piece of serious musical history. The Queen, who was a Frenchwoman, was anxious to hear the Church music to which she had been accustomed in her own country. There were difficulties about making so sweeping a change, and as nothing could be settled by discussion and compromise, eventually the two service books, Roman (more accurately Gelasio-Gregorian) and Mozarabic, were subjected to the ordeal by fire. The foreign book was consumed, but the native Mozarabic volume came out unharmed. Then, since the ordeal by fire had failed, the Queen had recourse to the ordeal by battle. A Castilian knight offered to defend the old order (and the old music) against all comers, and as it happened he overthrew the champion of the new music, who, needless to say, was a Frenchman. Notwithstanding, the Queen attained her object in part, for the Mozarabic Rite from henceforth was restricted to four parishes in Toledo.

Spain possessed a great monument of the music of the troubadour period, the last great monument, made near the end of the 13th century, long after all the Provençal troubadours had been driven out of their country. This was the Cantigas of Alfonso the Sage. The Cantigas were popular religious songs mainly concerned with the miracles of the Virgin Mary. The people were becoming tired of the hymns and sequences of the Church, and the King decided to collect and edit something else for them. The tunes might have been popular tunes or they might not, the verse at any rate was thoroughly sophisticated, and in this King Alfonso showed himself to be thoroughly in the troubadour tradition, for the troubadours were generally aristocrats who wrote sophisticated verse to sophisticated music performed for them by professional musicians. One of Alfonso's MSS., now at the Escurial, has exquisite miniatures of the players who, we may like to think, actually performed the music of the Cantigas.

It may be asked what was the condition of the minstrels shown in the MSS. of the Cantigas? Some answer to the question was to be found in the poems of the Archpriest of Hita, who lived about fifty years after Alfonso the Sage. The Archpriest of Hita ministered not only to publicans and sinners, but also to musicians, ballad-singers, and Moorish dancing girls. He wrote words for them to sing. He knew all the technical terms of their trade, and could speak to them in vulgar Arabic. He knew all about their instruments, most of which could be identified in the miniatures of Alfonso the Sage. How greatly he was admired in his own time and after was proved by his book, 'El libro de buen amor' ('The Book of True Love'), a book of words for minstrels to sing, together with a poetical autobiography of one who had spent his life among them. It existed in seven MSS., and was translated into Portuguese, although it was not printed until the end of the 18th century.

It was impossible to pass over the old ballads and the people who sang them. The old Spanish ballads were short epic-lyric poems sung to an instrument, either in choral dances or where people were gathered together for recreation, or during work in common. The irregular verse of this early Spanish poetry had given great trouble to students of Romance languages. If we looked at it from the minstrel's point of view—that is, from the musical point of view—there was no particular difficulty in fitting a line of eleven syllables to the same tune as a line of twenty syllables. A long note could always be divided or replaced by two or more shorter ones. The important thing was not the number of the syllables but the number of the beats. In the 'Poem of the Cid,' as in all early Spanish and Portuguese poetry that was sung by the minstrels, practically every line had four down beats and four up beats, a system probably derived from folk-dancing.

Metre, regarded from the musical point of view, certainly occupied the thoughts of minstrels, however unconscious they may have been of its principles, and however rule-of-thumb their practice. What was more, the metrical aspect—that is to say, the musical aspect—helped us to understand how the poem went, what it sounded like, and how it struck the person who heard the minstrel reciting, and that was something which no text-book of Spanish literature had yet been able to do.

The numerous lantern slides which illustrated Mr. Trend's paper were very fine, and proved deeply interesting to the many people present. Mr. H. C. Colles, who occupied the chair, opened a discussion in the course of which a number of questions were asked and answered.

SOME PROBLEMS OF PRESENT-DAY MUSIC

On February 19, Mr. H. C. C. Moule read a paper on 'Some Problems of Present-Day Music' at the meeting of the Musical Association, Prof. E. J. Dent being in the chair. Mr. Moule said that his principal object was to mention some of the chief points that made it so difficult to enjoy present-day music, and to sketch briefly some of the conditions that chiefly affected our hopes for the future progress of the art, and for the removal of the more serious difficulties which we must all feel at the moment.

The issue was, How far is the listener the chief and all-important arbiter of what is good in music? By the listener he meant the best type of concert-goer, a man of high musical gifts and good general ability, though not a superhuman imaginary perfect musician. The listener was by no means the only person whom a piece of music had to satisfy. Music might sound well, it might be well written from the performer's point of view, but in fulfilling these two conditions it had only begun to fulfil its function.

There were four people at least whose reaction towards music must be allowed for: the listener, the performer, the composer, and the student, the man who got to know a piece of music really intimately. The first of these was, after all, the most important person, even if he was not all-important. Perhaps the most serious mistake in the attitude of many listeners was the idea that the more they enjoyed modern music the less they would enjoy old music, for which there was no foundation whatever. To be musical merely meant to be gifted with a special subtlety in the appreciation of sounds and a special interest in sounds.

A special form which this conception of mutual exclusiveness took, that we must choose between ancient and modern, was the conception, so glibly fostered in us by writers of music, of a line of progress. This idea of the art as moving forwards along a single road, did infinite harm. Let us replace it by some such analogy as the exploration of the world's surface—an outward expansion in all directions, some appetising, some unappetising. New music, after all, was very much like new colonies. In the first instance, the young and foolhardy discovered them; they then became more and more fit to live in, and eventually they became safe for the least adventurous, too safe for the born explorer.

We all agreed that music must be beautiful; but what did this in fact mean? The man who said, 'Music must be beautiful' really meant 'Music must be what I like it to be,' thus shifting the blame from the listener to the music. If a man admitted that he meant 'Music must be what I like it to be,' he stood condemned of narrow-mindedness, but worded the other way about, the remark that music must be beautiful was too often used as an attack on modern music when it was paying, perhaps, less attention than one might wish to the needs of the listener.

Perhaps the most striking feature of the composer's outlook was his cheerful disregard, one might say his ignorance, of the painful truth regarding the average human ear, and the average musician's ear. Any of us who had had our eyes opened by training other people's ears would realise how inadequate the average audience's gifts must be for the appreciation of the effects on which the composer himself might so often be basing his technique. There was a possibility of music being so written that it could be appreciated on different levels of hearing. Classical music, in general, had something to offer to the ear which was capable merely of enjoying a good tune or a good rhythm, and it was an independent merit that it further had something else to offer to highly cultivated or highly gifted musicians. A good deal of modern music failed to offer corresponding attractions on the lower levels of listening, which was one of the chief reasons that limited its appeal. The other main obstacle which composers put in the way of their own work was that they were deeply interested in some half-technical scheme of composition, or they allowed their interests to develop along some very special line without facing the fact that this demanded a somewhat similar effort of specialisation from anyone who was to enjoy what they had written.

There was very little wrong with the player. He was the man who, of all others, was able to convey a word of warning now and again to the composer as to the effect of his work upon the listener. The appeal to the emotions was a very important part of the function of music. In the mind of the amateur it was apt to be very important indeed; in the mind of the professional, on the other hand, this emotional aspect was largely in abeyance, at any rate during working hours. In this fact lay one of the chief causes for the very serious mental barrier which existed between amateur and professional. To compare composers, or even rival performers, by any criterion of financial success was worse than absurd, but it was well to remember that we had to fall back generally on other means of comparison that were hardly less absurd. Standards that were not based on the verdict of the uninstructed public were as a rule ultimately founded on the verdict of the only two highly instructed experts, who notoriously agreed about practically nothing.

It was cheering to notice that the wider spread of general education had greatly widened the field of people who could take a serious interest in music and could, if they proved good enough, take up music as their principal study. It might be hoped that improved education and improved psychology would tend to ensure that in the future a larger number of the right people would take up music and a smaller number of the wrong people.

The gramophone was of far-reaching importance, although there was reason to fear that the tone-quality might never arrive very much nearer to the truth than it had reached at present. It was a curious fact that the tone-quality of music was an entirely different thing with one ear from what it was with two. In any concert hall the air-vibrations took a slightly different form at slightly different places, and it was an exceedingly interesting fact that the combination of these slightly different air-vibrations must be effected in the brain in order to produce the result that we were accustomed to regard as satisfactory tone-quality. On the gramophone this would involve a duplication of the record, or rather the duplication of the spiral groove, and the use of ear-phones. The gramophone had been the means of bringing within the scope of many keen listeners music for the appreciation of which they personally might need a good number of hearings, and not only chamber music but orchestral music. Formerly it was possible for most people to get that kind of familiarity only within the repertory of whatever instrument they happened to play themselves. The gramophone, for all the scratch and distortion of tone-quality, got quite as near to a correct representation of even Beethoven's ninth Symphony as many an ardent amateur pianist could ever get to his 'Hammerclavier' Sonata.

Broadcasting was interesting as a step towards the centralised control of music. Like everything else, music was likely to become more and more organized, and less and less a matter of individual enterprise, even if some of its manifestations continued to elude Government control. Poor organization, however, might be better than disorganization, which was a fair description of the state of musical effort now.

Obituary

We regret to record the following deaths:

John Ebenezer West, suddenly, while conducting a concert of the Railway Clearing House Male-Voice Choir on February 28. He was born at Hackney, on December 7, 1863. The son of musical parents, and a nephew of Ebenezer Prout, he naturally turned to music, though for a time it seemed likely that architecture would claim him. He studied at the Royal Academy of Music, becoming an Associate, and later being made a Fellow. He obtained his A.R.C.O. diploma in 1883 (receiving higher marks than any other candidate), and took his F.R.C.O. a year later. On his twenty-first birthday he entered the house of Novello, where he held the post of musical editor and adviser until his retirement a few months before his death. As editor he did notable work in the preparation of vocal scores of many important compositions by Handel, Brahms, Bach, &c. A large number of old Church services, anthems, and madrigals, were also made available through his editing. An admirable organist—he held four important London posts—he used his practical experience of the instrument to advantage in reviving a great store of old organ music that had been lost to sight. Particularly valuable is his series of Old English Organ Music, consisting of about fifty pieces by almost every English Church composer of note, from John Redford to the Wesleys. His adaptation to the modern organ of these old pieces (almost all of which were written before the introduction of the pedal board into England) showed an unusual blend of practical common-sense and respect for the originals. Many of the pieces were mere sketches, and never did he allow the necessary filling-in and the more extended lay-out to interfere with the essential simplicity of the music. No less worthy was his editorial treatment of organ works by Bach, Buxtehude, Frescobaldi, Merkel, Rheinberger, and other German composers, ancient and modern. He was successful, too, in transcriptions for various media, e.g., his pianoforte duet version of Elgar's 'Enigma' Variations. A prolific composer, he enriched the store of Church music by over seventy anthems (some of large scale), several services, and about fifty organ pieces, all dignified in style and of impeccable musicianship. He wrote also several Cantatas, two of which were produced at the Gloucester Festivals of 1904 and 1907. In 1889 appeared his valuable book, 'Cathedral Organists, Past and Present,' a mine of condensed and accurate information, of which a new and enlarged edition was published a few years ago. His marked gifts as a choral trainer and conductor probably owed much to his early experience as accompanist to the Hackney Choral Association, under the conductorship of Prout. It bore fruit in the work he did as conductor of choral societies in London, Reading, Croydon, and Warlingham, and, lastly, in connection with the fine Male-Voice Choir of the Railway Clearing House. He was also for a time conductor of the Bishopsgate Orchestral Society. The distribution of limelight in the musical world is strangely capricious and uneven. This gifted and indefatigable worker on behalf of the best in music was far less known to the general musical public than many who had infinitely less claim to its esteem. This was partly due, of course, to the fact of so much of his work being done behind the scenes, but it was at least as much a result of his unassuming character. Nevertheless, his personal worth and sound accomplishment as an all-round musician have achieved a reputation that will last. Church musicians, and organists especially, not only in England but throughout the English-speaking world, will long hold his name in honour. The funeral service at St. Marylebone Church on March 7 was largely attended, many prominent musicians being present, either as personal friends or as representatives of musical institutions. The Railway Clearing House Male-Voice Choir, about seventy strong, sang Mendelssohn's 'For ever blessed.'

André Messager, at Paris, on February 24. He was born on December 30, 1853, and studied music at Paris, chiefly under Saint-Saëns. His first pronounced success was the opera, 'La Béarnaise,' which was produced at the Bouffes-Parisiens in 1885, and performed in England during the following year. Thereafter he was very popular on this side of the Channel, 'La Basoche,' 'Les Petites Michus,' 'Mirette,' 'Véronique,' and 'Monsieur Beaucaire' all enjoying long runs. A recent work, 'Coups de Roulis,' is at present being played at Paris. Messager was also a successful conductor at the Paris Opéra-Comique. From 1901 to 1907 he was artistic director for the Grand Opera Syndicate at Covent Garden. He then became director and chef d'orchestre to the Paris Opéra, and conductor of the Concerts du Conservatoire. In 1918 he toured the U.S.A. and Canada with his orchestra. His strong associations with England were partly due to his marriage with Miss Hope Temple, the song composer.

Edward Robinson, at Chester. A Yorkshireman by birth, he became a lay-clerk at Chester Cathedral about forty-seven years ago. An excellent choir-trainer, he was for many years conductor of the Chester Glee Club, and had won many successes with his choirs at Eisteddfodau.

Kurt Grotrian-Steinweg, at Brunswick, on February 25. He was born at Brunswick, on May 30, 1870, and after an apprenticeship with various pianoforte-makers, he entered his father's factory in 1895. For thirty-three years he was director of the German branch of the firm of Grotrian-Steinweg. In 1923 he received from the Eberhard Karls University of Tubingen the honorary degree of Doctor of Philosophy, in recognition of his efforts to improve the standard of German pianoforte manufacture.

J. E. W. Lord, at Tupelo, U.S.A., on January 31. He was born at Rossendale, near Manchester, on November 5, 1862, and gave a pianoforte recital when only seven years old. At twelve he began studying the organ, and three years later he became a pupil of Kendrick Pyne at Manchester Cathedral. Subsequently he held posts at Bridlington and Harrogate Churches, and was a concert organist and pianoforte accompanist. He settled in America about twenty years ago, and had recently been a prominent cinema organist.

Ernest R. Newton, in London, on January 29. He was a pupil of Elvey, Oscar Beringer, and Prout. As a composer he was best known by his songs, many of which achieved wide popularity, e.g., 'The Drum Major,' 'Nita Gitana,' 'Ailsa Mine,' &c. Among various posts held by him was that of organist of St. Thomas's, Portman Square. For a time he was song editor for Messrs. Novello; and he was Director of the London School of Pianoforte Accompaniment.

William Gezink, at Manchester, aged fifty-seven. He began his career as a violinist, but later became a timpanist in the Opera orchestra of his birthplace, Amsterdam. Coming to England, he played for many years at the Covent Garden Opera. After some association with the Scottish Orchestra, he joined the Hallé Orchestra twenty-seven years ago. He was also a member of the Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra.

F. O. Sheard, at Glasgow. A well-known organist, choirmaster, and violinist, an ex-president of the Glasgow Society of Organists, founder and conductor of the Glasgow Philharmonic Orchestra, and at one time deputy-leader of the Scottish Orchestra.

Frank D. Tipping, at Dunfermline. For nineteen years organist of St. Andrew's Pro-Cathedral; at one time music-master at Radcliffe College, Leicester; composer of songs and pianoforte pieces under the pseudonym of Alban Keighley.

R. D. Waddell, at Glasgow. A prominent Glasgow business man and one time amateur violinist, who made a notable and valuable collection of old violins, &c.

Henry Riding, suddenly, at Chigwell, on March 3. He was for forty-nine years organist of Chigwell Church.

Milton Wellings, at Bath, aged seventy-nine. He was the composer of 'Some day,' 'At the Ferry,' and other songs that had a great vogue about thirty years ago.

Miscellaneous

Owing to the nearness of the General Election, the Conference on Church Music and Church Work which was to have been held at Ostend at Whitsuntide has been postponed until the first week in September. A smaller gathering, however, will meet at Ostend from May 20-25, for the benefit of such organists, clergy, and others interested who are able to attend. Full particulars from the Secretary, Mr. W. J. Hamilton, 1A, The Cloisters, Inner Temple, E.C.

The Annual Festival of the Free Church Choir Union will take place at the Crystal Palace on July 13. Choirmasters and others who wish for details should write to the Secretary, Mr. Arthur Berridge, 151, Chamberlayne Road, N.W.10. The occasion marks the twenty-first year of office of the conductor, Mr. Frank Fox Idle, and the organist, Mr. Arthur Meale.

Summer Courses for conductors will be held at Salzburg in July and August next, under the auspices of the Mozarteum. Prof. Paul Graener, of the Leipsic Conservatoire, and Prof. Bernhard Paumgartner, Director of the Mozarteum Conservatoire, will be in charge. Full information may be had from the Austrian Legation, 18, Belgrave Square, S.W.

A concert in aid of the Lord Mayor's Fund for Distressed Mining Areas will take place at Oaklands Church, Uxbridge Road, W.12, on April 11, at 8. There will be a strong list of performers, including Miss Carrie Tubb, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, Mr. Thalben Ball, &c.

The Musical Initiative Prize at the Tobias Matthay Pianoforte School was competed for on February 28, and won by U. Hy. Leibovitch, Wendy Tyler and Vesta Muth being highly commended. Mr. Ambrose Coviello adjudictaed.

Beg to announce the publication of
An Entirely Novel Series of Biographies

The Child's Own Book — of the — Great Composers

by

THOMAS TAPPER & GERTRUDE AZULAY

Price 6d. each net

THESE biographies are written in a manner which will bring the child into close intimacy with the lives of the Composers they portray.

Each book contains a sheet of pictures, illustrating the story, to be cut out by the reader and pasted in the places allotted to them.

Space is provided at the end of each biography in which the child can write an essay on the life of the composer, thus playing his own part in making the book.

Great scope is afforded for competitions, and for adding generally to the interest of the child's musical education.

Specimen Copies can be sent on approval.

Already Published: HANDEL, BEETHOVEN, SCHUBERT.
In course of preparation: BACH, HAYDN, MOZART, PURCELL, MENDELSSOHN, SCHUMANN, CHOPIN.

Trios
For Mixed Voices

(S.A.B. and S.S.B.) Unaccompanied

Four new volumes of Part-Songs for use in Schools, Arranged and Composed by

ARTHUR SOMERVELL

Price 1s. each
(combined staff and sol-fa notations)

IN schools in which class-singing is carried right up the school, it is often difficult to find music appropriate for all voices; because unison singing is difficult (for reasons of compass) for the older boys whose voices have changed, and duets are in every way unsatisfactory. For the upper classes of boys and girls, therefore, or for choirs in boys' schools containing trebles and basses, these volumes should prove most valuable. The pieces are simple and tuneful, and should present no difficulties to any well-trained group of scholars.

A NEW DEPARTURE FOR HEALTH AND VOICE

Ars Vivendi Breathing

With the majority, Ars Vivendi Breathing is out of the question through nasal congestion and blocking of the cranial sinuses. This must be dealt with before breathing is really started, otherwise strain results in fatigue. Tension is the enemy of vitality. Health loses its vigour, voice its bloom, and mind its power of concentration as strain grips the organism. This is the age of increasing tension, as shown in the growth of nervous ailments and of short-lived voices.

Ars Vivendi Methods are unique, forming a Comprehensive Technique of Manipulation to root of nose and nostrils, throat, and spine, accompanied with sound and other exercises to promote ease and flexibility of voice for speaking and singing.

OCTAVES

"The difference in the effect of octaves played in your way, compared with the old way, is remarkable."

An appreciation from a Teacher of the pianoforte:—

"What delights me most is that, though specialising in Piano Technique, you put it in its proper place, and use it only as a means of musical expression. It is evident that musical culture and refinement are before you all the time."

The Charles A. Gillett method may be successfully acquired by means of twelve lucid and practical Correspondence Lessons designed for home study and dealing with all phases of technique.

An appreciation from a MUS. BAC. DUNELM., F.T.C.L.:—

"Really I wish I had known of your system years before I did."

THE MADRIGAL SOCIETY

(Founded 1741)

The Madrigal Society offers TWO PRIZES, being the "Molineux Prize" of TEN POUNDS, with the Society's Medal, and the "Society's Prize" of FIVE POUNDS, for the best and second best APPROVED MADRIGALS, in not less than four, nor more than six parts, the upper part or parts to be for one or two treble voices.

The character of the Composition to be in accordance with that of Madrigals of the best style and form, with imitative Part-Writing; not a mere Part-Song or harmonized Melody.

The following conditions must be complied with, viz.:

1. That the Alto and Tenor parts be written in their respective clefs.
2. That the signature be repeated at the head of each page at least.
3. That the intended "Tempo" be clearly indicated.
4. That the words, to be selected by the Composer, be written out in full on a fly-leaf at the beginning.
5. That not more than one Composition be submitted by each competitor, which must not be in the Composer's autograph.

The Madrigals to be delivered, addressed to the Secretary of the Madrigal Society, The Oaks, Ashtead Woods, Surrey, on or before October 1st, 1929, each Composition having a device or motto affixed thereto, with the Composer's name in a sealed envelope bearing a corresponding mark.

The Award of the Judges will be made known at the meeting of the Society in January, 1930.

"Finger Magic"

HOW THE MASTER MUSICIAN IS MADE.

"I have been reading a little booklet which I have termed 'Finger Magic,' and I would very much like to place this book in the hands of every pianist, violinist, and 'cellist in the Kingdom.

"We all know that the secret of the virtuosi does not consist in the amount of time they expend in instrumental practice—one recently stated that he often does not touch the instrument for a week, and another has affirmed that musicians are positively superstitious about practice. The secret of the success of the great masters must therefore be looked for in another direction than in the capacity for hard grinding practice on orthodox lines, and I have been experimenting with a system which may well prove to be a solution, or at any rate to a large extent.

"The system to which I refer develops the hands not by practice in the ordinary sense, but by a series of exercises, based on sound psychological as well as physiological laws, and the descriptive booklet, issued by the Cowling Institute, contains some astonishing letters from musicians which would convince me, even if not backed up by my own experience, that the quickest and easiest way to develop the strength and flexibility of the wrist and fingers so essential to pianists, violinists, and 'cellists is to perform the operation away from the instrument, when the mind can be centred upon that object alone.

"I anticipate that within a measurable period the knowledge contained in this little booklet, and in the lessons given by the Cowling Institute, will form part of the curriculum of every teacher and be a necessary equipment of every violinist, 'cellist, and pianist."—

ERNEST JAY, F.R.C.O.

Singing at Sight

A GRADED COURSE OF INSTRUCTION IN READING MUSIC FROM THE STAFF NOTATION

By G. E. LINFOOT, M.A., B.Mus., B.Sc.

Musical Adviser to the Sheffield Education Committee; Formerly Lecturer in Music in the University of Sheffield.

The Complete Series consists of Six Books.

The Teacher's Books contain

1. A graded course of Sight-Reading Exercises which are plentiful, very carefully graded, musical, and interesting to sing. Many are taken from English and other traditional songs, and from the works of Purcell, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Spohr, Schubert, Berlioz, &c. Phrasing marks throughout the earlier books.
2. Notes on the use of the exercises and on the necessary preliminary work.
3. A course of ear-training exercises in both pitch and rhythm, running concurrently with the sight-singing practice.
4. An introduction to the study of notation (often called "Rudiments of Music") and organised practice in musical dictation. These are introduced gradually, as they are naturally required, along with the sight-reading course.

The Pupil's Books contain the Sight-Reading Exercises only.

Teacher's Edition, in Stiff Cloth Cover; Book I., 1/3; Books II. to V., 1/6 each; Book VI., 2/-. Books I. to III., in one vol., 3/3; Books IV. to VI., in one vol., 3/9; Books I. to VI., in one vol., 7/-.

Pupil's Edition, in Strong Manilla Covers: Books I. to V., each 4½d.; Book VI., 6d. In Limp Cloth, 2d. each extra.

THOMAS HOPE Educational Publisher and Contractor for School Materials

Chapel Street Works, Ancoats, MANCHESTER

Does Every Pianist Know?

THAT the hand is by no means naturally suited to playing the piano and has to be carefully adapted to its new work;

THAT the short thumb with its lateral movement, although useful in many passages, comes in for a great deal of sad misuse by the majority of players in the "thumb-under" movement, and is never used for an "up-and-down" movement except at the keyboard;

THAT the tendons of three of the fingers are by nature tied together in a most provoking manner from the pianist's point of view;

THAT these are not the only difficulties, for the pianist's "tools" consist of more than his fingers; the whole arm as far as the shoulder-blade being quite as important in the playing of difficult music;

THAT there are fifty-nine muscles to be trained in each arm.

Modern music being increasingly complex and more exacting in regard to execution makes a scientific training absolutely indispensable to the successful pianist. The Full and Correct Muscular Development and Special Keyboard Methods of the "From Brain to Keyboard" System will give you this training.

"Empire : Song : Book"

A collection of suitable music which is so arranged that it may be sung with or without dramatisation

The following list explains the scheme of the collection:

"RULE, BRITANNIA"

ENGLAND

Interlude—Medley of English Airs, including "The Vicar of Bray," "Here's a Health unto His Majesty," "The Lass of Richmond Hill," "Good-morrow, Gossip Joan," "The Girl I left behind me."

Songs:

(1.) "Come, Lasses and Lads"
(2.) "With Jockey to the Fair"
(3.) "The Bailiff's Daughter"

WALES

Interlude—Medley of Welsh Airs, including "Cadair Idris," "The Ash Grove," "The Gentle Bird," "The Rising of the Lark."

Interlude—Medley of Sea-Songs, including "The Golden Vanitee," "Heart of Oak," "The Mermaid," "Tom Bowling," "The Bay of Biscay."

Songs:

"She stands a Thousand-wintered Tree"
"An Empire Song"

"GOD SAVE THE KING"

"Rule, Britannia commences the performance. The pianoforte music, consisting of a medley of English airs, is played, to which the children listen, or, in the case of dramatisation, the characters assemble. Three English songs, which will be sung, follow on. A similar plan is adopted with Welsh, Scottish, and Irish songs, also the song for "The Colonies," in turn. The words of the song for the Colonies are taken from the poem of Sir William Watson, "She stands a Thousand-wintered Tree," and the music is by Percy E. Fletcher, who has also composed the music for "An Empire Song," which, with "God Save the King," concludes the performance.

Technique AND Expression

In Pianoforte Playing

By FRANKLIN TAYLOR

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express myself more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

A STUDY OF FRANZ LISZT

BY A. BRENT-SMITH

When asked once what he would have liked to be if he had not been a musician, Liszt is said to have replied, 'The first diplomat in Europe.' Therein lies a frank acknowledgment of his vast ambition and an unconscious revelation of his spiritual shortcomings. Had he forgotten, when he made his answer, that throughout his life he had felt a desire for the religious life, or did he feel, like so many Ecclesiastics of the past have felt, that the two careers are not mutually exclusive? We cannot tell, but yet we do feel that his reply was strange, and somewhat unworthy.

Many men, if faced by such a question, might have replied, 'a diplomatist,' but few, I think, would have specified that they wished to be the 'first' diplomat in Europe. How clearly Liszt's reply indicates his own estimate of his capabilities and worth! How accurately it reveals the extent of his ambition—that ambition which had driven him to emulate the miraculous performances of Paganini; to eclipse with prodigies of bravura the nimble and fastidiously delicate playing of Thalberg; to be in the realm of symphonic and sacred music what Wagner was in the realm of opera!

Such an ambition was wholly admirable, urging him to attain a standard of pianoforte technique and to exploit a species of music which has had an immense influence upon all music since his time. But his confession that he would have wished to be the first diplomat in Europe is, as I have said, an unconscious revelation of a spiritual deficiency. Diplomacy is not quite the profession for a really great artist; at least, it is difficult to believe that really great creative artists would have chosen such a profession. Goethe, if asked to choose an alternative profession, would probably have chosen to be a painter; Michelangelo, a poet; Beethoven, a poet; Verdi, a dramatist. None of these, I feel sure, would have chosen diplomacy. The reason why a great artist would not be a diplomat is that a man with a strong personal point of view cannot help running contrary to the opinions and occasionally the goodwill of those around him, whereas a diplomat is successful in that he proves himself master of himself and his own feelings in each and every trying situation. It is only too true that Liszt was endowed with these qualities of perfect self-possession and adaptability; that he had, as his own promptings suggested, a real capacity for diplomacy.

These qualities we may attribute to his precocity, and to the fact that from childhood he had been kept in the limelight, a training which tends to develop unusual self-possession. To be a prodigy is not necessarily injurious to a man's development, as the lives of such men as Mozart and Mendelssohn prove, but there is no doubt that public appearances do give a man (or a child) opportunities for developing studied attitudes and manners from which the child, unspotted from the world, is free.

We know that Liszt brought to his playing a deliberately leonine method of dominating his audience by his magnificence and hauteur; that even when playing in his most inspired manner he was fully aware of the effect he was making upon his audience. Amy Fay, in her fascinating book upon pianoforte-playing, says:

> 'Anything so beautiful as he looks when he sits at the pianoforte I never saw. . . . His personal magnetism is immense. He can make one cry all he chooses. When Liszt plays anything pathetic, it sounds as if he had been through everything, and opens all one's wounds afresh. . . . Liszt knows well the influence he has on people, for he always fixes his eyes on some one of us when he plays, and I believe he tries to wring our hearts. When he plays a passage, and goes pearling down the keyboard, he often looks over at me and smiles to see if I am appreciating it. But I doubt if he feels any particular emotion himself when he is piercing you through with his rendering. He is simply hearing every tone, knowing exactly what effect he wishes to produce and how to do it. In fact, he is practically two persons in one—the listener and the performer. But what immense self-command that implies!'

If he was nervous (and we can take it for granted that a man of his intensely emotional nature was nervous), he was careful to impose his second and dominating character upon his nervous shrinking self. To be self-possessed and to have command of a second personality is not the character from which great spontaneous work can grow. How different from Liszt's complete armour of self-control was Chopin's fear of crowds, or Schubert's awkwardness, or Beethoven's almost boorish behaviour! Their shyness was the opposite of Liszt's savoir faire. They had no control of their personality, consequently their conduct and their composition were natural. Liszt, on the other hand, the perfect courtier, the self-confessed diplomat, was frequently in his conduct and his compositions artificial. Of course, Liszt had his own true self, and in his own character he wrote much that was sincere and personal, but unfortunately his acquired self, so calculating and urbane, was for ever at his elbow, urging him to indulge in courtly graces and gallantries.

It was not so much that he was a hypocrite, but that he never, all through his life, quite made up his mind whether to be a great saint or a great sinner. He nibbled at the idea of a religious life for many years, what time he was enjoying to the full the sweets of the secular world. Even when he fully embraced the religious life and, dressed in all the sanctity of the monkish habit, was known as the Abbé Liszt, the famous virtuoso who had renounced the world, he was privileged to enjoy all that the world had to offer—success, wealth, and marriage. In fact, his final renunciation of the world by his adoption of the religious life gave him all the pleasures of being known as a saint with none of its actual inconveniences. His renunciation of the world (even in a greatly modified form) at the ripe age of sixty-eight, when he had secured all that Fame or the Flesh could give, is comparable to his advice to young players, written at the death of Paganini, whom he had avowedly set himself to emulate: 'Let the artist of the future whole-heartedly give up the egoistic and vain rôle of which Paganini was, we believe, a last and illustrious example. . . . Let virtuosity be to him a means and not an end.' Such advice coming from such a man, who never even in his serious compositions for for the pianoforte could altogether forgo the pleasure of showing what he could do with his fingers, reads like the advice to young men given by the aged Solomon to beware of the attractions of women.

By the time that Liszt had reached the age of thirty-six he was, without question, the greatest pianist in the world, and was known as the composer of many brilliant pianoforte pieces and transcriptions. But to be known as the composer of pianoforte pieces, however successful, was not his whole ambition. The proud, eagle-faced man who had soared above Thalberg now sought still greater heights—to be to modern orchestral music what Beethoven had been to the symphony, or else to be to sacred music what Richard Wagner was to opera. So, with one eye upon the dim religious light of Rome and the other upon the more dazzling lights of the opera house, he set to work to realise that vast ambition. In spite of his multifarious duties as opera-producer, pianist, teacher, and writer, he found time to compose an immense amount of large instrumental and choral works—symphonic poems, concertos, masses, and oratorios. But somehow the Rhapsodies were still his most popular works, and the serious compositions remained, perhaps honoured, but certainly unsung. This state of things still continues, and the reproach is often levelled against concert-promoters that knowing well the immense popularity of Liszt's Rhapsodies, their neglect of his serious works is due either to ignorance or cowardice.

Actually the reproach is undeserved. The Rhapsodies do get many hearings, because in them Liszt wrote the music which came naturally to him, and embellished it in the way in which he excelled. But in his serious compositions the situation is entirely different. Here his character spoils the result in two ways. First, there is his strange vacillation between the cloister and the theatre, which takes in music the form of a desire to achieve something noble combined with a desire to astonish (this, of course, refers chiefly to his pianoforte music). Secondly, there is his superb self-possession, which urged him to arrange his emotions and to translate them into higher powers, so that what he intended to be eloquence proves to be bombast, and what should have been pathos is sloppiness.

Let us examine these characteristics more closely.

In spite of his protest against mere display, he never really lost his love of astonishing, or proving his technical superiority to all comers. Even in the days when no one was allowed to applaud his performances or to thank him for playing, it was not that he did not love admiration, but that he desired a reception different from that accorded to all other players. When on a few occasions he did appear in public as a pianist, his love of astonishing was still there, though it took the form of paying apparently no attention to his hands while transforming single scales into double octaves, thirds, &c., gazing about the orchestra and admonishing the players. This abnormal facility, which had for years brought him incessant adulation, was, in spite of his occasional renunciations, too deeply ingrained in his character ever to be eradicated. Nearly all his pianoforte compositions, therefore, are diseased with the fatal blight of pianistic facility. Not even the Pianoforte Sonata escapes. True, there are pages in which every note is essential to the expression of its vigorous ideas, but now and then we see the pianist shoving the composer off the pianoforte stool with a gesture of impatience. 'I think,' says Liszt the pianist, 'I think we might turn this arpeggio into a cascade of double octaves. Of course, it 's a tour de force, but it 's worth it. And this tune, it 's so nice and harmonic, let 's squirt some arpeggios over it. Of course, very few will be able to play it, but ——' and the pianist had his way.

It was his misfortune, then, to be endowed with too many aspirations. If he had been anxious throughout his life to be a great composer he would not have found time to develop his phenomenal technique, and his compositions would have been free from these tiresome excrescences. As it was, his pianistic technique proved rather difficult to control, being, as it were, a highly-horsepowered motor engine, itching for three-figure speeds, and consequently moving with difficulty through ordinary lanes and country villages. For a moment we travel at a reasonable speed and are able to enjoy the scenery, but—the engine roars and we have cadenza'd off at a hundred miles an hour, and our pleasure is quenched with fear. The difficulty Liszt found in controlling his many ambitions is but another aspect of the saying, 'How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God!'

The other quality in his character which stood in his light—his self-possessed arrangement of his emotions—is to be found in many of his themes and their settings. It must not be thought that Liszt did not feel deeply or truly. A man of such enormous vitality must indeed have had very real emotions. He had, however, when playing, so schooled himself to be both listener and performer, that even when drawing tears from the eyes of his audience he would be fixing some person (frequently a young lady of not inconspicuous charms) with a penetrating glance, as if to say, 'Is it not truly wonderful?' That is, not only did he feel the emotion intensely, but was able simultaneously to analyse the ingredients of that emotion. When, therefore, he turned to composition this double self led him to exaggerations which a single-minded man would have escaped. When the ideas he wishes to express are bold, strange, or fantastic, his themes are frequently magnificently appropriate, but few of his melodies convey thoughts at once tender and strengthening. Too frequently they are built upon repeated notes which languish in feminine cadences, such as the 'Liebestraum' in A flat, and the quasi-second subject of the Pianoforte Sonata. Throughout his works it will be found that his themes—that is, musical phrases chosen chiefly for their working possibilities—are far better than his melodies—that is, tunes chosen chiefly for their tenderness or charm. In the Pianoforte Sonata the principal theme-group is, for all its bombast, very striking and full of possibilities magnificently realised; whereas the second theme, a variant of the first, is mawkish and self-pitying. In 'Les Préludes' the theme of the Allegro section (a strange anticipation of the first subject of Franck's Symphony) is far superior to the other principal melody, which grows more and more like the Trio of Schubert's C major Symphony each time it appears. In the Thirteenth Psalm the opening dramatic bars are most moving in their appeal, but the contrasting passage, 'Look on me,' with its luxurious chords, suggests the allurements of sirens rather than the expression of penitence. Not even the indication religioso can rob this melody of its atmosphere of satin cushions and magnolias. It is unnecessary to supply further instances of this difference in the quality of Liszt's themes and melodies. Almost any of his large works will afford other instances of this unfortunate disparity of invention.

At the Harold Brooke Choir concert at Bishopsgate Institute, on May 8, at 8, the first performance will be given of a new choral work by Arthur Bliss—a Pastoral, 'Lie strewn the white flocks.' The programme will include also Act 1 of 'Semele,' part-songs by Elgar, &c.

DAWN OR DUSK?

STRAVINSKY'S NEW BALLETS: 'APOLLO' AND 'THE FAIRY'S KISS'

BY LEONID SABANEEV

I admire Stravinsky—not for his music, but for his colossal vitality, his intense practicalness, his American characteristics. He is a man in whom there is a genuine 'will to power,' a musical Cæsar or Napoleon. But were all the actions of those honoured men so much admired? I think not, and nevertheless they are for ever surrounded with a halo. To Cæsars everything is forgiven; when they reach the throne their most trivial deeds are accepted as inspirations, and philosophers and historians, not to mention politicians, dwell for years on even their most dreamy utterances.

Yet it is not given to everyone to be a Cæsar. Nor is it so easy to become a Stravinsky, though I am beginning to think that many are far more musically gifted than he. There are persons who climb into history on all fours, and with such energy that no power can dislodge them.

Stravinsky is now both the Cæsar of music and its Napoleon. Every work of his is first of all commented upon, then it becomes the subject of enthusiasm, and afterwards of imitation. One is involuntarily reminded of the similar position of Meyerbeer in the musical world of the 1840's. And Stravinsky's cautious, politic attitude towards the public resembles Meyerbeer's. He despises it, and knows how to manage it, but in the long run he wisely and cleverly reckons with and humours it. He has a real statesman's head.

He is everlastingly busy, this musical Ford. Always planning some new thing wherewith to interest this fickle world, which he really scorns, he 'feels' the market to find out, not what the world wants, but whether he can make something that it will begin to demand, something which he can persuade them is necessary and indispensable, and inspired with unusual genius. It should be noted that Stravinsky's fundamental quality—a matter of surprise to some critics—consists in the protean nature of his style, its eternal variability, and this is the direct outcome of 'feeling' the market. We are not living in the 18th or 19th centuries, when the alteration of tastes was a slow and stately process; ours is an age of fashions that change weekly, of electric advertising signs, aeroplanes, and wireless. Styles, too, no longer last for years, and woe to the composer who does not vary: his productions become wearisome, and his market is lost.

And so Stravinsky has created two new compositions. His factory works steadily, but he is careful not to overload the market by an excessive output. He has to turn out a moderate, limited supply, since the majestic leisureliness with which they are issued is a guarantee that everything is of the highest quality, that there is a hidden meaning to every note in these things. 'Apollo' and 'The Fairy's Kiss' are the titles of his new ballets. (Stravinsky is faithful to the sphere which made him—the sphere of the ballet.)

The first thing that strikes one when listening to and examining these compositions is the simplification all along the line. It seems as if the old magician who let loose on the poor musical world all the spirits of cacophony has now skilfully got them back into the magic bottles, and is delighted to find that his followers have not yet managed to do likewise; with them as a background the old innovator stands out as an extraordinary and unexpected euphonist. It reminds me of the old story of the peasant who complained to the wise man of being cramped for room, and asked for counsel. The sage advised him to bring the cow into the house, which consequently was more crowded still. The peasant renewed his complaints, and was told to bring in a couple of pigs, and the ass. Finally, the whole of the domestic animals were installed in the hovel. The peasant was desperate. Then the sage bade him turn them out gradually, first the ass, afterwards the pigs, and so on. . . . When this was done the peasant heaved a sigh of relief—there seemed to be room enough and to spare. This legend has a very close application to Stravinsky; he, too, had peopled the musical world with monsters and scorpions, and when he gradually began to turn them out and remove them the public joy knew no bounds. 'Can this be Stravinsky? It 's so melodious, simple, clear. . . .'

Moreover, it is of no consequence that, as music, it is still rather coarse and tedious, and that in general, but for the formidable Cæsarean title of Stravinsky on the cover, music of this kind would attract no attention. Everyone is overjoyed that Stravinsky is returning from the land of cacophony to one in which there is a certain degree of musical euphony.

But my joy is dimmed. It suddenly occurs to me that all this comes of old age—that Stravinsky's musical digestion has been ruined by an excessive indulgence in musical pickles, and the doctors have put him on a strict 'Apollonian' diet; he is bidden to become a vegetarian, to avoid meat and wine, and even salt; he must give up prohibited resolutions and chords, and be a good boy generally. Human nature is such that a return to simplicity is always regarded with suspicion, whether it be that of Count Tolstoi following the plough in a peasant's blouse, or of Stravinsky struggling into the costumes of Mozart and Tchaikovsky, with the sharp angles of his 20th-century frame sticking out of the old-fashioned waistcoat. The sight of a man setting out to rejuvenate himself is sad and painful, because it is a sign of decrepitude.

This music has to be naïve. . . . But do you mean to say that it is permissible to a Napoleon or a Cæsar to become naïve? Why, nobody would believe them. Napoleon dressed as an infant prodigy, with lace ruffles and bare little legs! It would be dreadful. It smacks of the operetta 'La Belle Hélène' and Menelaus. Some suggestion of this flashed across my mind at the sight of Stravinsky unexpectedly (and, I may add, to the horror of the poor Frenchmen, who hate Tchaikovsky) paying strange and general compliments to . . . . Tchaikovsky, adopting a pious attitude towards him, working up his themes, and, still more surprising, working them up as becomingly and smoothly as would any amiable academically-trained composer. It is all so even and well-proportioned, the auxiliary and passing-notes are grammatically placed: it is evident that the man has received some teaching in his time. The harmonies are simple; the melodies—borrowed, it is true—are quite melodious, thanks to the successful intervention of Tchaikovsky. In general, it is rather like the 'Pot-pourri on Favourite Airs' which they used to write in the good old days. What sorcery is this? Stravinsky on a strict diet! Or becoming childish! Or rejuvenating himself and touching up the wrinkles! In any case, one dreadful thought intrudes itself—old age, old age, and again old age.

It is certainly not a young creation. In it there is nothing of the youthful passion of 'Petrouchka,' nor of the virile audacity of the 'Rite of Spring,' in which, despite the cacophony, there is a certain elemental, barbaric, and attractive force. It may be said that Stravinsky has always been somewhat of a musical pyrotechnist (it was not without significance that he made his debut with 'Fireworks'), but he is now quiet and subdued; the sorcerer has been transformed into an apothecary who dispenses digestive medicine, into a vegetarian on a strict diet. The Bolshevik, the Lenin and Trotsky of music, has become a peaceful rentier spending the rest of his days in a suburban villa. It is quite possible that this is a very good thing for many people, and if the Emperor Diocletian had begun to raise cucumbers earlier, a large number of the Christians tortured by him would have been glad; I myself, as a man who, musically, is of a bourgeois turn of mind, rejoice to some extent at this change. I prefer Stravinsky on a diet, Stravinsky the bourgeois, to Stravinsky the Lenin and Trotsky of music; better for him to live in a villa and issue peaceful restaurant menus instead of fiery proclamations, such as the Pianoforte Concerto. Heaven only knows what this music of 'Apollo' is, but there is nothing ugly in it; it is like the music in the cinema, which flows past the ear agreeably and unnoticed, making no impression on it.

I have heard 'Apollo' and 'The Fairy's Kiss' several times. Long ago I also heard the harmonious and organized chorus of enthusiasts who prepared opinion in advance. Why make such preparations, when Stravinsky's halo shines so brightly in the world that I myself am often hypnotised by it, though I try to escape? But this time the composer himself has been a great help. In 'Apollo' I was astonished at the poverty of the musical invention, the meagreness of the thought. It has its good points—it is well put together, and the hand of an extremely skilful master is evident. He reminds me of a chef who, out of frogs' legs or other ingredients of little edible value, concocts a menu which may be eaten, even with a certain amount of pleasure. But the quality of the musical material is poor and second-hand—it is music obtained from a very ancient stock of provisions, something like mammoth steaks or cave-rhinoceros cutlets. I have previously said that nothing remains of Stravinsky the innovator. This music would be acceptable to any professional conclave of the end of the 19th century. As we know, Stravinsky has for a long while been returning, either to Bach or to Glinka. He may be congratulated. He has now returned—not, however, to Bach or Glinka, but to the bosom of a senile academism, to the kingdom of dead and correct tonal sequences, to the world in which everything is vapid, lean, and sober. He, this cunning pyrotechnist, has always been temperate, but we (some of us) have not noticed behind the glitter of his fireworks the inner poverty of his psychic organization. Stravinsky is neither a Titan nor a man possessed, nor a prophet: he is a property master. And 'Petrouchka' and 'The Rite of Spring' are the 'properties' of a genius—artificial volcanoes, quite harmless to the most estimable public.

Sometimes it is impossible to deny to this music a special beauty; it is constructed with sense and good taste. Now and again a belated cacophonous turn of a phrase creeps in—the result of the incomplete clearing of his musical digestive organs. In 'Apollo' there are more of them, but in 'The Kiss' they have disappeared—everything is smooth and slick ad nauseam.

It is a strange idea to resuscitate with the 'senile kiss' of the fairy in the form of our composer the living, simple, sincere, and truly eternal muse of Tchaikovsky! One feels that there is a lack of coherence in the statement of the question. Apparently it is Tchaikovsky's muse that has kissed the old man, and not the other way about; and with what an amazing result! The contrast with the tone of the composer's previous work is so great that these typically second-rate melodies of Tchaikovsky's, selected from his casual compositions, seem to have the freshness of genius. In the distribution of musical gifts amongst composers, Stravinsky seems to have been overlooked so far as melody is concerned. But the resourceful composer, as the genuine Lenin and Trotsky of music, found it in a trice—he requisitioned what he lacked from Tchaikovsky, and thereby transformed himself into a melodious, even a very melodious, musician.

Some time ago a protest might have been raised against the requisitioning of another composer's work in this way, but in our age of vague ideas concerning ownership in general and authors' rights in particular, it is difficult to argue against it. A minimum of seventy-five per cent. of a musical composition is made up of melody, and in estimating the general impression produced by Stravinsky's creation we must assign most of it to Tchaikovsky's 'kiss' and a very insignificant proportion to the credit of the composer's personal merits. This, by the way, is the second instance of the expropriation by Stravinsky of the property of the bourgeoisie, the melodic millionaires, for the acquisition of whose wealth his (in a musical sense) proletarian soul thirsted. (A few years ago he requisitioned something of old Pergolesi's, and had the noisy approval of the whole musical world!) Speaking generally, I consider it a splendid idea. In their time so many men have written good music; why not help oneself to it, bring it up to date, and in general treat it as one's own? Already two bright lads have constructed fox-trots out of Chopin's works; 'Pulcinella' and 'The Fairy's Kiss' continue this maximalist line of action in the sphere of composition. If this principle may be applied to property as a whole, why not extend it to the musical wealth created by the composer? The latter must be plundered for the benefit of the poor and for the triumph of universal justice. In actual fact the contemporary composer is in urgent need of the ability to write good music, and good melody in particular. In this respect he is utterly indigent. And, alongside, 'the despot feasts in his luxurious palace'; some Beethoven or Tchaikovsky sits like a dog in the manger on his melodic riches, and gives of them to nobody.

Thus we are confronted with a new type of innovation—innovation by expropriation. I cannot blame Stravinsky for this. In the first place it is quite modern, and therefore must be good. Secondly, I see very clearly the 'revolutionary necessity' for such a step. These expropriations, this recourse to the fairy's kiss of Pergolesi, of Tchaikovsky, are dictated simply by the instinct of self-preservation. A decaying talent, a talent which has lost its power of invention, is obliged to fall back on rejuvenating resources; it compounds for itself a musical elixir vitæ. Somewhat on the lines of Dr. Voronov's method it tries to graft on itself the melodic glands which Nature has in general denied it (it is a sort of musical Graves' disease, the result of an insufficiently developed musical thyroid gland). The part played here by Pergolesi and Tchaikovsky is merely that of the apes bred by Dr. Voronov for his experiments. To tell you the truth, when it comes to this kind of musical rejuvenation I am not a great admirer of Dr. Voronov, though if it is a matter of life and death a more serious operation may even be risked. But all this combined undoubtedly proves one thing—the ageing of the creative power, a decline in the supply of fresh hormones and active juices, desiccation, senile sclerosis. It began long ago, but, dazzled by the brilliance of the previous pyrotechnical achievements, we hardly noticed it. After 'The Rite of Spring' it became perceptible in those senile dodderings from side to side. 'Œdipus Rex,' and even the Pianoforte Sonata, are typically senile compositions. Now we are evidently witnessing the final act of the drama—the Sunset of Stravinsky.

THE DAYTON (U.S.A.) CHOIR

English choralists have given a hearty welcome to this body of singers, whose visit was regarded (as we have no doubt they would wish it to be) rather as a friendly gesture than as a concertising excursion. They were heard twice at the Albert Hall, and also in Scotland and the Provinces. They proved to be an unusually well-equipped body—indeed, we cannot recall a choir with such delightful, well-produced and controlled soprano tone; and so far as the bass department is concerned, only Russian choirs seem to be able to excel them in sonority and profundity. Their technique, however, is patchy, and at present their best singing is lavished on the feebler items in their programme—for their repertory is decidedly mixed, in the uncomplimentary sense of the term. It contains too many contemporary works of a sentimental type, and too few big standard examples. They have yet to show a mastery of polyphonic singing, both in the Palestrinian and Bachian style. Having mentioned the shortcomings of their repertory, we give as an example the fact that at their first concert English music was represented by one work only—a Carol by Maurice Besly! At the second concert a little Byrd was added, apparently in response to criticism on this point. In the matter of small choral forms, whether it be madrigal, motet, part-song, or glee, this country need fear comparison with none, and we hope that one result of the choir's visit will be a better acquaintance with English choral writers, from Elizabethans onwards. Mr. Finlay Williamson, the conductor, has trained the choir to such a pitch of virtuosity in some respects, that there is no height to which they cannot confidently aspire. They are said to be the best choir in America; with the experience of this English and Continental tour to help them, there is no reason why they should not be at least the equal of the best in the Old World.

ARTHUR BLISS'S 'PASTORAL' *

At a time when so much new music and poetry reflects something of the hardness and cynicism of a post-war and mechanised age, it is a refreshing surprise to find a composer of an extended work setting his scene in Arcadia, with fluting Pan as the central figure. (The obsession of machinery is bound to be a mere phase, of course. 'Pacific 231' is very well for purposes of conveyance; but for the only kind of transport with which music has any concern a composer must look elsewhere.) The mention of Arcadia must not be taken to imply that Bliss's 'Pastoral' has to do with mere artificialities of the Watteau type. His shepherds, reapers, and lovers are flesh and blood, with concerns of the primal sort that makes the world go round.

The text is drawn from sources so far apart in race and time that one is surprised at the way it hangs together: Ben Jonson's 'The Shepherd's Holyday'; Fletcher's 'A Hymn to Pan'; 'Pan and Echo,' a poem by Poliziano, translated by Geoffrey Dunlop; 'Song of the Reapers,' from Theocritus, translated by Andrew Lang; a few lines from Fletcher's 'The Faithful Shepherdess'; and three poems by Robert Nichols. Although performance should be continuous, practically each movement is self-contained, but for the purpose of rounding-off, the Finale recapitulates some of the material used in the opening number.

A page of introduction, starting thus:

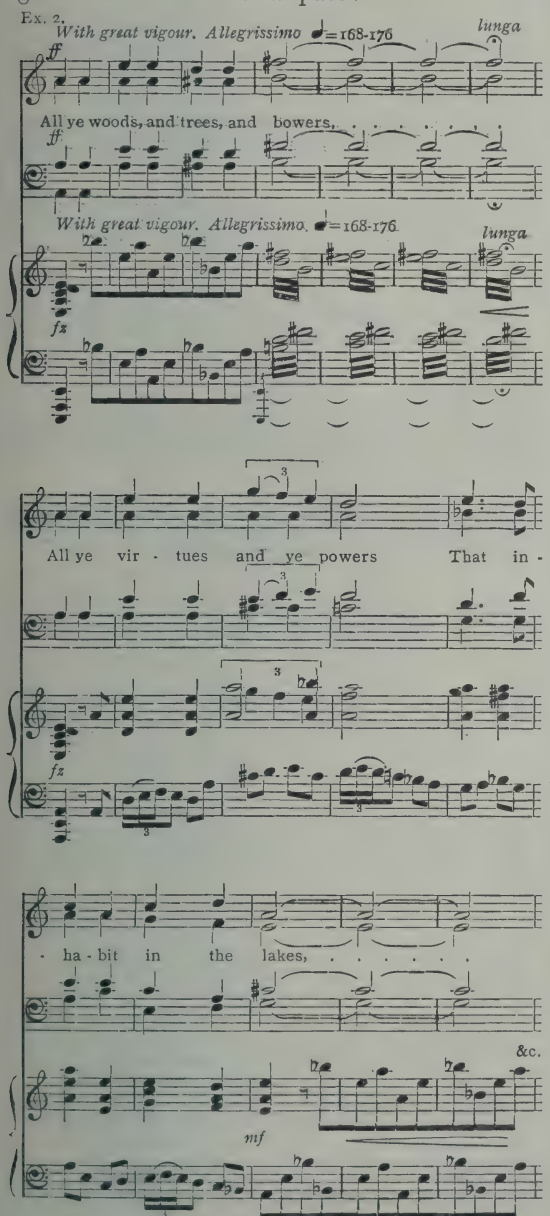
leads to a vigorous setting of Jonson's poem. (By the way, choralists of a literary turn of mind will smile at meeting here with an ineptitude that has achieved something like fame.

* Novello, 2*s.* 6*d.*

It is a striking instance of the ease with which even a great poet may fall at times. Jonson is dealing fancifully with flowers. The primrose is 'the primrose drop, the spring's own spouse' —good; the daisy, 'bright day's eye'—even better, because of its pretty reference to the opening and shutting of the flower; but Ben then falls clumsily. Cowslips become 'lips of cows,' a mere inversion that is neither fact nor fancy, and which anticipates some of the worst of the prosaic lapses of Wordsworth.)

The 'Hymn to Pan' gives the chorus a fine opportunity, with bold straightforward lines against a vivid orchestral part:

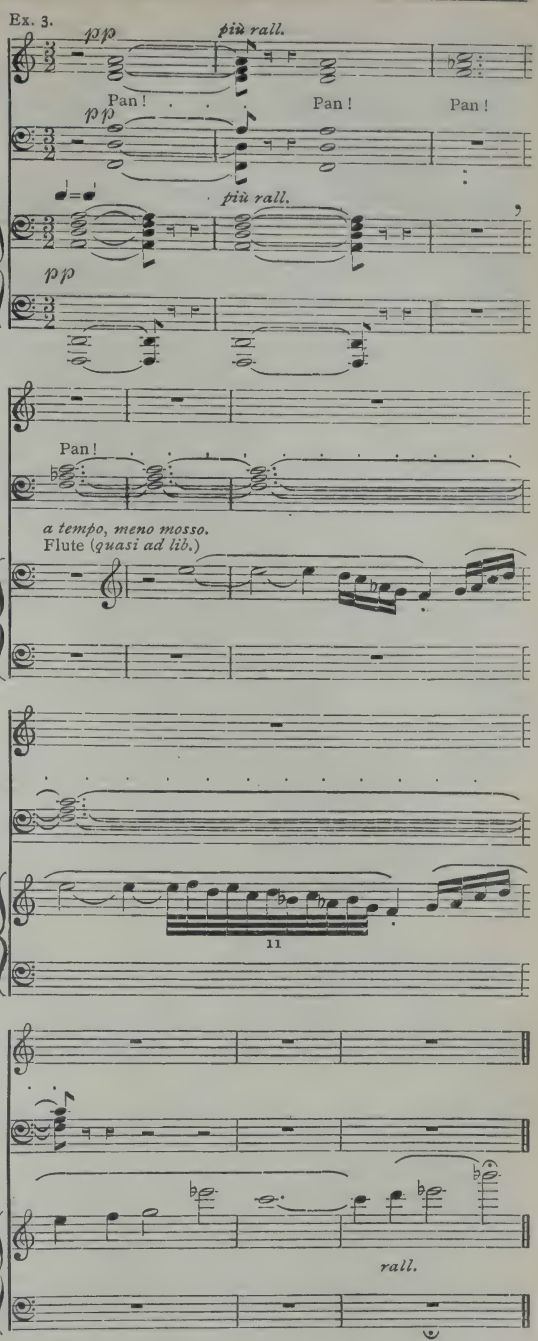
Ex. 2.



With great vigour. Allegrissimo ♩=168-176
lunga
All ye woods, and trees, and bowers,
With great vigour. Allegrissimo. ♩=168-176.
lunga
All ye vir - tues and ye powers That in -
- ha - bit in the lakes,
&c.

It quietens at the end, with a whispered evocation to Pan, the response coming in a brief passage for flute:

Ex. 3.



An instrumental section follows, called 'Pan's Saraband,' a rhapsodical solo for flute over gravely-moving parts for strings. It leads into a delightful chorus in dialogue form, 'Pan and Echo.' The text gives us a favourite device of the old poets—the ambiguous effect produced by echo:

Where while I seek you, Echo, do you lie, Love?
(I Love!)
Yes, and you love me say, none other—none?
(One!)
You, you alone I love, for you there's no one else?
(One else!)
Can you not say, 'I love you, Pan, none other?'
(Another!)

And so on. The ending of this chorus must be quoted:

Ex. 4.

The next two numbers are delicate and warmly expressive settings of poems by Nichols—'The Naiads' Music' and 'The Pigeon Song.' In the former there is some highly effective use of three-part writing for women's and men's voices in alternation. 'The Pigeon Song' is for soprano solo, and is really a duet between singer and flautist. The part for flute, however, is not of the old complacent in-thirds-with-the-voice type, but a rhapsody in which the resources of the instrument (and the player) are used to the fullest extent. (If the clashing C♮ and C♭ in the introduction:

Ex. 5. Andante moderato. ♩=92 is not a deliberate and surprisingly good imitation of the coo, or call, of a pigeon, we are mistaken!)

This number leads straight into a roughly vigorous 'Reapers' Song,' in which the piccolo is given a brilliant show. Here is its final fling at the end:

Ex. 6

(The hint of jazz in the opening bars of the accompaniment will not escape the reader.)

Relief in this rousing number is provided by a few passages of austere simplicity. There is a fine antique touch about the quieter passages.

This brings us to the Finale, the most extended part of the work. It begins with a couple of pages for orchestra, illustrative of three lines from Fletcher:

> See the heavy clouds now falling,
> And bright Hesperus down calling
> The dead Night from the underground, leading into the 'Shepherds' Night Song,'—one of the Nichols poems.

The Introduction is delicious—no other word fits. Take these bars as a sample, with their beautiful diatonic dissonances:

Ex. 7. Andante sostenuto. ♩.=54.

There is a good deal of unaccompanied work in the chorus. In fact, the orchestra is silent during the closing page, the work ending on this note of simplicity, with a delightful cadence:

Ex. 8.

The Pastoral is scored for flutes, strings, and timpani. It takes about thirty minutes to perform. The 'Pigeon Song' may be omitted, the work then needing only chorus and orchestra. The degree of difficulty is not great, as things go nowadays; the chief need is for imagination and alertness. For the music of this Pastoral is above all things poetic—not less so when concerned with what may be called the technical details of harvesting (e.g., 'See that the cut stubble faces the North wind or the West; 'tis thus the grain waxes richest') than with (say) the amorous 'Pigeon Song.'

The dedication is to Elgar, and it is reasonable to suppose that a few Elgarian touches (especially in the Finale) are by way of graceful compliment.

This article is written on the strength of a study of the score; and reviewers are justifiably diffident about committing themselves when so much new music proves to be effective only on paper. Nevertheless, we are not afraid to say that the Pastoral is a really distinguished work, marked not only by originality, but by the far rarer virtues of freshness and charm.

Occasional Notes

Reviewing Sir Henry Hadow's 'Collected Essays' in the Evening Standard, Mr. Arnold Bennett said that the book 'ought to have contained an essay entitled "Are we a musical nation?"' with an answer in the negative.'

Had there been such a chapter, Sir Henry's answer would almost certainly have been different from Mr. Bennett's, because he is a musician, and musicians know that the question no more admits of a plain 'Yes' or 'No' than does the old catch, 'Have you left off beating your wife?' The 'non-musical' cry is usually based on some such fact as our evident lack of enthusiasm for grand opera. But it is indisputable that a flourishing opera may go hand in hand with a meagre musical culture. Nations, like individuals, should be judged by what they possess, rather than by what they lack; and there is in this country an enormous amount of well-directed musical activity that would not come under the notice of Mr. Bennett. Sir Henry Hadow knows all about it, however.

What is so hastily said of the whole country is often said of London. It has been repeated lately, on the ground that the National Sunday League has been forced, through lack of support, to abandon its Palladium series of orchestral concerts. But this merely proves that the Londoner who is fond of orchestral music doesn't want it on Sunday afternoons, or, alternatively, that he won't go to the Palladium for it. The Palladium is a fine variety house, but not a good concert hall. Before admitting that there is no demand for first-class orchestral concerts on Sunday afternoon, however, we should like to see the matter put to the proof by a revival of the series that Sir Henry Wood conducted at Queen's Hall for so many years.

It may be argued that Londoners don't want any kind of concert on Sunday afternoon; they are pictured as horizontal, torpid from their mid-day meal. Yet on two recent Sundays ten thousand of them rose up from the beef and Yorkshire and went to the Albert Hall to hear Kreisler; and almost as many have done the same for recitals by McCormack and lesser artists. Clearly, then, there is a big public for Sunday afternoon music, and it is hard to believe that if ten thousand can keep awake sufficiently to go to the Albert Hall (of all London's concert rooms the hardest to get at and the worst acoustically) to hear 'star' soloists in music not always of the best quality, a mere two thousand can be drawn to Queen's Hall for a fine orchestral concert.

It is pleasant to see Mr. Bennett saying handsome things about Parry. 'Parry,' he says,

> 'could have knocked spots off Mahler in any branch of musical composition. But then Parry was a mere Briton. Perhaps the most valuable and influential thing in Hadow's book is the appreciation of Parry (whose book, "The Art of Music," is, for me, the finest, kindest eye-opener to ignorant amateurs in the English language).
> 'Sir Henry Hadow dates the modern renascence of English music from 1880, when Parry's "Scenes from Shelley's 'Prometheus Unbound'" was performed at the Gloucester Festival. I do not think that Sir Henry over-praises Parry, but I think he is a shade too benevolent towards Brahms.'

Mr. Bennett also thanks Sir Henry for confirming his (Mr. Bennett's) 'long-held suspicion that that solemn composer Brückner, who is continually being preached to us, is a mediocrity. I wish he could have condemned Mahler also; he doesn't.'

Mr. Bennett ends by saying that 'Collected Essays' is 'a book for everyone with sense enough to attend a good concert, and sensibility enough to enjoy the same; and all concert goers ought to read it.'

We agree. The trouble is that of the thousands who have sense enough to go to a good concert, very few have the sense to read a good musical book.

The lot of the music critic attached to a daily paper is so hard in many ways that he might ask to be spared from maladroitness in the editorial department. The anxiety to catch the reader's eye with a good caption is understandable, but sub-editors seem to be unaware that some technical knowledge is necessary in dealing with articles on music. Here are two examples that have occurred during the past few weeks. A London daily gave a report of the Dayton (U.S.A.) Choir's first English concert at Bristol. The critic remarked that the women seemed to have been trained somewhat on the lines of boy trebles, the result being that at times the effect was that of an all-male-voice choir. This is so plain and simple a statement that only the least musical could fail to grasp its meaning. Nevertheless, the matter appeared with the heading, 'Women's voices that sound like men's!'

The other case was as bad. The report was of the Geneva Festival of Contemporary Music. The critic, speaking of Max Butting's Symphony, said that it was suggestive of a symphonic framework rather than of a completed work; the principal thematic material seemed to have been left out; and he added:

> 'During a good part of the time the composer was going through all the motions of making an omelette with all the utensils, but without, however, the eggs.'

This figure of speech is so familiar, and so plainly adapted, that no ordinarily intelligent reader could miss the point. It was missed, however, by the caption merchant, who took it in the most literal sense, and, in large caps, entitled the article:

'MIXED MELODIES AT GENEVA FESTIVAL.'

'MUSICIAN WHO GESTURED LIKE A CHEF.'

The blue pencil has also a good deal to answer for. A recent concert notice carried so striking a sub-title that we read it with special interest—only to find that the matter shouted in the caption was not even mentioned in the text: the blue pencil had cut out the reference but spared the sub-title! It is to be hoped that the general public doesn't ascribe such stupidities to the critic.

We are now able to add further particulars concerning the U.S.A. speakers at the Anglo-American Conference to be held at Lausanne on August 2-9. Mr. Clarence G. Birchard, who has long been a powerful force in American educational circles, will deal with the importance of choral music. Mr. John Francis Cooke is to speak on 'Musical Idealism in the New World.' Prof. Louis Mohler, of the Teachers' College, Columbia University, will discuss 'The Teaching of Music Appreciation in the High School.' Among the speakers on vocal teaching will be Dr. Ernest G. Hesser, Director of Schools in Indianapolis and Chairman of the National Conference Committee on Choral Music. On the orchestral side will be Mrs. Agnes Moore Fryberger, lecturer for the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra Association; and Mr. Arthur Sheppard, Educational Director of the Cleveland Orchestral Association.

The speakers on general matters will include Dr. Augustus O. Thomas, State Superintendent of Schools in Maine, and Mrs. Ruth Bryan Owen, member of Congress for Florida, and daughter of William Jennings Bryan. Mrs. Owen is held to be among the most brilliant orators in the United States.

The Sectional Chairmen are expected to be as follows: Secondary School Music—Dr. William Earhart, a prominent musical educationist; Elementary School Music—Miss Mabelle Glenn, President of the Music Supervisors' National Conference; University Music—Prof. John W.

Beattie, of North-Western University, Ill.; Church Music—Prof. Leo Lewis, head of the music department at Tufts College, Boston; Vocal Teaching and Choral Training—Mr. Herbert Witherspoon, formerly a leading bass at the Metropolitan Opera House, and one of the most prominent teachers in the States; Pianoforte Teaching—Mrs. Harriet A. Seymour, a pioneer in the pianoforte class movement. Among well-known performers who are expected to be present and to take part in the daily music-makings are Ernest Schelling, Poldini, and Guy Maier. Some prominent American organ recitalists will also be heard at the Cathedral, which has been placed at the disposal of the Conference. There is every indication that the Conference will be a unique occasion, as enjoyable on the social side as it will be profitable on the musical. Readers should lose no time in booking. The English office of the Conference is 2, Albany Courtyard, Piccadilly.

We have on several occasions warned readers against music-publishing agencies that ask the composer for money. It appears from letters in the press that novelists and other authors are now being victimised in the same way. As to composers, the following instance has come under our notice during the past few weeks. A reader submitted three manuscripts to the —— Publishing Agency (the law on this point is so feeble that we dare not give the name). In reply, he was told that the agency would publish them if he would contribute at least £10. Being cautious, and not liking the 'at least,' he wrote again, asking for a definite maximum figure. The reply was still hazy: the maximum would be about £20; on his instructing the agency to proceed with the engraving they would let him know the exact amount. The composer then forwarded the correspondence to us, with a request for our opinion. Not always, however, is the intended victim so wary. We received a letter recently from one who had parted with a considerable sum, in return for a large consignment of copies of his music, the disposal of which, save as a gift, was naturally beyond his power. To make matters worse, he had been out of employment for a long time, and the sum paid to the shark was almost the last of his savings. He was a fool, of course, but he has our sympathy none the less. We mention these two cases because of the frequency with which readers inquire as to the bona fides of certain agencies. It will save time and expense if they remember that no reputable publisher ever asks a prospective client for money. If a manuscript takes his fancy, he offers to purchase it outright or to pay a royalty on sales.

We have to thank a Reading correspondent for an interesting fact concerning Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel.' On the original manuscript Strauss described the work as being 'in Radau form'—a 'Radau' being a row, a racket, spree. Perhaps the writing was not quite clear; or maybe the engraver frowned on such frivolity in the title of an important work. At all events, when the proof came along 'Radau' had been toned down into 'Rondo.' Strauss was amused, but let it stand, and a Rondo 'Till' duly became. Our correspondent had this information from a well-known Berlin conductor to whom Strauss showed the original manuscript.

Dr. Malcolm Sargent's refusal of a handsome offer as conductor in a cinema, on the ground that it would satisfy neither his musical appetite nor his artistic conscience, has touched up some cinema musicians. Mr. Terence Casey, of the Tivoli, for example, says that Dr. Sargent has uttered 'a direct challenge to the intelligence and taste of British cinema audiences.' He goes on:

> 'My cinema and gramophone experience has shown me that the typical film-goer is in no sense a Philistine. True, he may clamour in his thousands for "Annie Laurie" or "The Keys of Heaven" (with variations), but I have as many requests for Beethoven, Stravinsky, and Bach.'

This would carry more weight if Mr. Casey would go on to tell us what works of these composers he has played at the Tivoli, and how he has played them; in other words, have they been given in complete form and with due regard to the composer's expressed intentions, or have they been butchered as most music is at the hands of cinema musicians? A later sentence in his letter makes us fear the worst:

> 'In the accompaniment to the modern feature film, seldom fewer than a hundred and fifty melodies are used, and, unless it is a comedy, quite fifty per cent. are classical.'

If (as seems likely) the playing of a 'request' Bach, Beethoven, or Stravinsky work means that some of its thematic material is squeezed into that pot-pourri of 'melodies,' Mr. Casey's would-be defence of cinema music turns out to be much more like a condemnation. Curiously, he brings forward those statistics as a proof of his contention that 'the cinema organ has done, and is doing, more to raise the taste for good music than any symphony orchestra, because it, like the gramophone, reaches the masses.'

But Mr. Casey overlooks a vital fact: the symphony orchestra is no longer heard only by a few hundred people in a concert hall. By means of wireless and the gramophone it now plays to an audience of millions, and it plays fine music as it ought to be played—in its complete form, and either with the original scoring or transcribed by an acknowledged master. The cinema numbers its patrons by the million; but how many of them go to hear the music. And of those few how many are able to listen in comfort, and free from distraction? With the symphony orchestra's audience—probably as numerous as the cinema crowd—the case is otherwise: they switch on, or put on a record, or go to the concert hall with no other object than that of listening. The music is played as the composer wrote it, and it receives a proper hearing. In the cinema it is usually mangled and travestied, and becomes a mere accessory to a form of entertainment that often touches the very depths of vulgarity and tastelessness.

In the course of his argument Mr. Casey shows some further confusion of thought. He says: 'The sooner our highbrows realise that a man may quite conscientiously laugh at Harold Lloyd one minute and shed a tear for Beethoven the next the better it will be.' But he mustn't suppose that an appreciation of music and a sense of humour are found together only in folk blessed with ape-like brows. The rest of us are just as ready to enjoy in quick alternation the classical composer and the low comedian.

Mention of cinema music reminds us to turn up H. G. Wells's book 'The King who was a King,' which, as readers will remember, is actually the scenario of a film play, and contains a good many references to the musical side of such entertainments. Music is one of the very few things about which Mr. Wells knows little, so his remarks are too sketchy to be convincing. But they have a good deal of interest. For example: Several music critics were recently struck by the cinema possibilities of Berlioz's 'Faust,' and expressed regret that Berlioz had been born too soon for co-operation in a form of art that would have given his unique gifts full play. Mr. Wells had anticipated the critics. At a point in his scenario where a coronation scene is toward, he says:

> 'Now we are free for big music in the manner of Berlioz at his most fantastic. The music of the Coronation scenes that follow should have a strong element of bells, and quasi-religious phrases and patriotic clangour; Berlioz is badly needed to co-operate in the development of this Music-Spectacle Film, and it is a great pity we cannot recall him from the silences.'

Here are some of Mr. Wells's vague but suggestive ideas as to the kind of music he wants at times: 'The music would be threaded more and more with a rhythmic tapping and clinking . . .' '. . . there is troubled and then militant music, rising to a menacing crescendo of noise.' '. . . music with a marching, militant quality, drum taps and trumpet airs, begins but dies away to the quality of an unimportant accompaniment . . .' '. . . the music is full of the shrilling of cicadas and the rustle of leaves . . .' 'An air already rendered in the tapping and clinking of the Prelude reappears, strengthened and bolder . . .' 'The music must swing into the rhythm of modern machinery . . .' 'Swell of religious music . . .' ('Swell' is a favourite term with Mr. Wells—'the music swells proudly to "Rule, Britannia,"' 'a corresponding swell in the music,' &c.)

In his Introductory Chapter Mr. Wells discusses 'The Film, the Art Form of the Future,' and holds up a poor prospect for the other art-forms. He thinks that film and music will be composed together, and goes on:

> 'The spectacle will march to music, sink to silence, or rise to thunder as the effects require. The incessant tiresome chatter of the drama sinks out of necessity, the recurrent exasperating 'What did he say then?' When once people have been put upon the actual stage, they must talk and flap about for a certain time before they can be got rid of. Getting people on and getting them off is a vast, laborious part of dramatic technique. How it must bore playwrights! But with the film the voice may be flung in here or there, or the word may be made visible and vanish again.'

We wish cinema directors would note that remark about the spectacle 'sinking to silence'; one of our chief complaints about cinema music is that there is far too much of it. Is there any cinema where the music comes and goes instead of persisting to weariness? If so, we have not been lucky enough to hit on it.

Mr. Wells says that in the film

> '. . . we have something that can be raised to parallelism with the greatest musical compositions; we have possibilities of a Spectacle equal to any music that has been or can be written, comprehending, indeed, the completest music as one of its factors. Behind the first cheap triumphs of the film to-day rises the possibility of a spectacle-music-drama, greater, more beautiful, and intellectually deeper and richer than any artistic form humanity has hitherto achieved.'

This is a very long shot, and it will remain so until the film industry in general is run by people with better taste and more intelligence than is possessed by those at present in charge. And Mr. Wells shows a misunderstanding of music when he says it will be equalled by the film. Evidently he cannot think of music as a self-contained art. No matter how great the triumphs of the cinema, the status of the masterpieces of orchestral and chamber music will remain unaffected, because there is no ground of comparison or competition. With opera the case is different. The fact that Chaliapin and some other leading operatic artists are already considering offers to sing for the so-called 'talkies,' at fabulous fees, points to the eventual supersession of opera in its present form. Its ultimate fate will be to tour the world neatly packed in flat round tins, together with the Hollywood heroine of the hour. How long will it be before we see announcements of 'The Ring, in umpteen reels'; or to quote (from memory) a recent concert notice in The Times, 'Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," or "From Hungary to Hell," in eighteen episodes'?

Honegger's 'King David' will be given in its original form as a stage play by the Cambridge University Musical Society, on May 10 and 11. The composer will conduct, and the author of the libretto will also be present. Another event of special interest will take place on June 7, when the Society will play Manuel de Falla's Harpsichord Concerto, with the composer at the keyboard. All particulars of these two performances may be had from Messrs. Miller & Son, Sidney Street, Cambridge.

Much deserved publicity has been given to the performance at Oundle and other public schools of big choral works. Here is an example of what may be done by a County School in a by no means large centre of population. A few weeks ago the choir and orchestra of the County School, Hawarden, conducted by the head master, Mr. Arthur Lyon, gave what is reported to have been an excellent performance of the B minor Mass. Certain of the choruses were allotted to special classes, the whole body joining in such portions as the Sanctus. The event made a fitting conclusion to a remarkable spell of duty by Mr. Lyon, who, during his thirty-three years as Head, has seen his pupils increase from twenty-two to four hundred. Choral-singing on a big scale is no new thing at the Hawarden school, performances having been given of 'The Messiah,' 'Gerontius,' 'The Golden Legend,' the whole of 'Hiawatha,' 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' and substantial extracts from Wagner. The school orchestra has played symphonies by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and Schubert. Such fine work for music will provide Mr. Lyon with happy memories in his retirement.

Mr. Stanley Roper has been appointed Principal of Trinity College of Music. Mr. Roper is a versatile musician who has distinguished himself in many fields. From his tenth to his fifteenth year he was soloist at Westminster Abbey. He became organ scholar of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, in 1899, returning thence to Westminster Abbey, where he was deputy organist until 1922. Since 1918 he has been organist and choirmaster at His Majesty's Chapels Royal. He holds a similar position at St. Margaret's, Westminster. A successful lecturer, adjudicator, examiner, and conductor, Mr. Roper brings to his new post an all-round practical knowledge that should be of great value to the College.

The Diapason quotes the following cri du cœur from the 'Answers to Correspondents' column of an Iowa paper:

> 'I play the pipe organ. I have played it for a year now and have practised two and three hours a day all this time. Several people have told me that I'll have thick ankles because in pedalling the muscles of the ankles are exercised and will enlarge. Is this so? I am quite young, just sixteen the other day, so I'd hate to have big, thick ankles. Of course, one does exercise the ankles a great deal in playing, and, besides, I play pedal exercises about a half-hour daily. I do wish you would publish an answer to this, as my whole family have had many arguments over the matter.—L.'

The question was apparently too much for the Iowa consultant, for no reply was given. The Diapason, however, improved the occasion, leading off with the pronouncement that playing the organ professionally was more likely to develop a thick skin than thick ankles.

From the 'Wireless Programmes' in a daily paper: 'Song and a louse.'

After this, 'The Song of the Flea' will be tame.

BRAILLE CENTENARY

There are several good reasons why musicians should take a prominent part in celebrating the hundredth anniversary of the invention of the device by means of which blind folk are enabled to enjoy literature and music at first-hand. Louis Braille was himself a blind musician. His invention has placed a large proportion of the great things in music within the reach of thousands of the blind; it has enabled them not only to read music, but also to commit their own musical ideas directly to paper; and, in return, the art has benefited by the accession of a great number of gifted musicians who would otherwise have been restricted by infirmity to little more than listening.

A hundred years ago it was impossible for a blind person to set down on paper a single idea, literary or musical. To-day millions of books and magazines, and thousands of musical works, are published in Braille script, and are read easily by the sightless.

A letter has been sent out from the National Institute for the Blind suggesting a singularly appropriate and practicable method of celebrating the centenary. It points out that Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' was composed to commemorate the fourth centenary of the perfecting of the art of printing by Gutenberg, and draws attention to the analogy between Gutenberg and Braille. What one did for the sighted in 1440, the other did for the sightless in 1829. The suggestion is, that during the present year choirs should perform the 'Hymn of Praise,' wholly or in part, as an act of thanksgiving for benefits thus conferred on countless numbers of blind people, and that at such performances a collection should be made in aid of the National Institute—the largest institution of its kind in the world.

There is probably no centre too small for this suggestion to be acted on. The larger town choral societies may perform the entire work; for orchestras there is the fine opening Symphony, or one of its sections; and Church choirs have at their disposal a number of the separate choruses and solos. Even the solitary organist with too small a choir, or with none at all, may play a transcription of one of the three movements of the Symphony, or of such popular numbers as 'I waited for the Lord.' One of the strongest arguments in favour of this form of celebration is that it enables many to help through the collection, or by assisting in the performance, who would be unlikely or unable to send a donation direct to the Institute.

We strongly support the appeal, which is signed by Sir Walford Davies, Sir Dan Godfrey, Dr. Alfred Hollins, Dr. John B. McEwen, Mr. W. Wolstenholme, and the Chairman of the Institute, Capt. Sir Beachcroft Towse.

Two of these names—Hollins and Wolstenholme—serve as a reminder of the great services rendered to Church and organ music by these two distinguished composers and performers, and by the great number of their blind confrères.

The Musician's Bookshelf

'The Oxford History of Music.' Second Edition. Revised by Percy C. Buck.
Introductory Volume, edited by Percy C. Buck.
Vol. 1, 'The Polyphonic Period,' Part 1, by H. E. Wooldridge.
[Oxford University Press, 17*s.* 6*d.* each volume.]

This work is the recognised shelf-mate of 'Grove,' and there will be general rejoicing at the advent of a new edition. The Introductory Volume is a fresh feature, and one that should make a wide appeal. It owes its origin to a feeling that Wooldridge's profound study of mediæval music is not the best possible opening for the work. It is liable to give the impression that all early music was only a kind of groping experiment, and that it was felt to be such by its creators. 'But,' says Prof. Buck in his Preface:

> '. . . are we justified in assuming that for centuries musicians felt themselves to be struggling in the dark after something dimly conceived to be possible, never imagining that they had attained to a means of expressing the human feelings of joy and beauty in a form felt at the time to be entirely adequate? It is an axiom of the modern historian, that however backward the development of any branch of human life may seem when scrutinised by a later generation, to its own contemporaries it is always "modern."

A thousand years hence the Prof. Wooldridge of the period will doubtless write a volume in which he will try to persuade his own sceptical generation that "L'Après-midi d'un Faune" and "Pétrouchka" were actually thought to be, by music-lovers of the present day, adequate and moving embodiments of living beauty. Those who knew Prof. Wooldridge know that, so far from controverting this axiom, he would have claimed it as the fundamental belief of his historical creed; and they know that his volumes were purposely written to lay bare the anatomy of his subject, and not to inquire into the functions of its heart.'

It was inevitable that the old wrong impression of early music should have become established, for, as Prof. Buck points out later, our knowledge of it was generally confined to the severer types. We knew little or nothing of music on its social side; yet in the Middle Ages folk were dancing and singing to strains that no doubt gave them as much pleasure as 'Black Bottom' or 'Hot Lips' give our dancers of to-day. (Probably far more, if we may judge from the facial expression of most present-day exponents of the slide and wriggle that has superseded the dance.) Even the mediæval music of which copies had survived was shrouded in the fog of notational and other difficulties. Recent research has not only cleared away many of the obscurities; it has also revealed much that we can perceive to be beautiful without making condescending allowances.

The Introductory Volume covers the ground pretty completely, with chapters on Greek music (Cecil Torr), Hebrew music (Dr. Oesterley), notation (Sylvia Townsend Warner), ancient instruments (Kathleen Schlesinger), theoretical writers up to 1400 (Dom Anselm Hughes), plain-song (Dr. Frere), folk-song (A. H. Fox-Strangways), social aspects of mediæval music (Prof. Dent), and bibliography (M.-D. Calvocoressi). The writers are all acknowledged experts; the treatment of even the most abstruse subjects is live and human; and the material is well documented. Prof. Dent has the most obviously attractive theme, and his chapter is full of curious and sometimes amusing lore. Thus, although we are prepared to find that the mediæval teacher of music was unlikely to spoil the child through sparing the rod, he proves to have been even more free with it than we imagined. Punishment followed hard on the fault, at all events in the choir school. Hear the Custumal of St. Benigne at Dijon, at about the time of Guido of Arezzo:

> 'At Nocturns, and indeed at all the Hours, if the boys commit any fault in the psalmody or other singing, either by sleeping or suchlike transgression, let there be no sort of delay, but let them be stripped forthwith of frock and cowl, and beaten in their shirt only, with pliant and smooth osier rods provided for that special purpose.'

'Pliant and smooth': there is a relish in the choice of adjectives. Apparently the writer knew the feel of those rods, either as executioner or as victim.

The stick was ever-present in terrorem as well:

> 'At Mattins the principal master standeth before them with a rod until all are in their seats. . . . At their uprising likewise, if they rise too slowly, the rod is straightway over them.'

Here is a cunning and deceptively mild cure for drowsiness:

> 'If any of them, weighed down with sleep, sing ill at Nocturns, then the master giveth into his hand a reasonably great book, to hold till he be well awake.'

One can see the osier ready for the drowsy youngster who, still weighed down with sleep, dropped that reasonably great book!

At Limoges the human hand was also used with resounding effect:

> 'Stephen was strenuous in discipline, and most severe to correct the failings of delinquents. For if any raised his eyes but a little in church, or smiled but faintly, or slumbered but lightly, or negligently let fall the book which he held, or made any heedless sound, or chanted too fast or out of tune, he received forthwith either a rod on his head or an open hand on his cheek, so loud that the sound of the blow rang in all men's ears; a punishment that was specially inflicted on the younger boys, to their own correction and the terror of the rest.'

(But perhaps discretion had also something to do with the choice of the smaller fry.)

Modern lighting methods have removed one branch of sport practised by early choristers. In 1330 the Bishop of Exeter complained that:

> '. . . those who stand in the upper stalls in the choir, and have lights within their reach, knowingly and purposely throw drippings or snuffings from the candles upon the heads or the hair of such as stand at the lower stalls, with the purpose of exciting laughter and perhaps of generating discord.'

We like that distinction between 'heads' and 'hair.'

As one of the many 'modern' touches in this chapter, take this remark made by a lady to a man who refused to listen to music on the ground that he was a soldier and that his business was fighting:

> 'I should think that, as you are not at the war, nor in any likelihood of fighting, it would be a good thing if you were to have yourself thoroughly well oiled and put away in a cupboard with all your fighting gear until you were wanted, so as not to get more rusty than you are already.'

This vigorous and unanswerable smack might have come straight from Dame Ethel Smyth.

Prof. Dent gives a most interesting account of the development of the liturgical drama. The best-known example is that which is now sung in many churches as a sequence at Easter; in the Middle Ages it was acted as well as sung, with a sepulchre and grave-clothes as properties.

The first of Wooldridge's two volumes on the Polyphonic Period has been very slightly edited, and in directions that make for easier study—a few omissions, a re-casting of a portion of the material, and some small additions made in order that the more important results of recent research might be included.

The remaining volumes of this 'Oxford History' will be eagerly awaited.

'A Life of Song.' By Marjory Kennedy-Fraser. [Oxford University Press, 7*s.* 6*d.*]

This unpretentious little book tells of a long life and of adventurous experiences such as seldom fall to a musician's lot. The author's father, David Kennedy (1825-86), threw up his business at Perth when he was thirty-two and had a wife and five children, under the double impulse of song and travel. Mrs. Kennedy-Fraser tells in placid, not to say prosaic fashion, of her father's musical wanderings, which a more emotional writer might have made to seem wild and fantastic.

Kennedy was a singer of Scottish songs, and he gratified his passion for travel by giving concerts to his fellow-countrymen at the ends of the earth. For an independent man this was well enough; but Kennedy thought nothing of taking his womenfolk along with him to share not only hardships but also very real dangers. However, this Scotch family were hardy folk.

Marjory was thirteen when, in 1872, she set off with her father on a tour of the world. She had already been as far as the Shetlands as his accompanist. They sailed in a twelve-hundred-ton clipper, and saw no land from March till June, when they reached Melbourne. The plan was an eighteen-months' driving tour through Victoria, New South Wales, and Queensland. Outside the cities the country was primitive. The Kennedy girls roughed it; but without complaint and, indeed, generally, it seems, with enjoyment. The most Mrs. Kennedy-Fraser now allows herself is this: 'I have often asked myself since why my father undertook this trip.' It took six weeks of heavy and constant travel to do the five hundred miles between Melbourne and Sydney. It was Kennedy's pride never to cancel a concert or be late. Hence:

> '. . . . I rode in with my father to Gympie township (in Queensland) at 7.30 p.m., mud from the hem of my long riding-skirt to the neck of its tight-fitting bodice, and yet was with him on the platform in a pink silk frock precisely at 8.'

The family party (of seven) went on to Tasmania, South Australia, and New Zealand. 'Dunedin proved to be a very hive of Scots, and here we sang for over a month.' 'Our mother left us at Auckland . . . to see the younger ones left at home in Scotland.' In New Zealand the Kennedys enjoyed various perils of stormy seas, fords, and precipices. Sailing to California, they were as nearly wrecked as could be.

Kennedy had eleven children, and all of them sang. Robert and James went to study at Milan, where in 1879 (after she had toured South Africa) they were joined by Marjory, while the father was in India. The Italian chapters of the book stand in curious contrast to the colonial travels at the beginning and to the Hebridean adventures which come later. Not the colonies nor the Hebrides brought bad luck to the Kennedys, but their Italian studies did. In 1881, Kate, Lizzie, and James were at Nice, working with Lamperti by day and going to the opera at night. On March 23 the opera house was burnt down, and the three young singers perished.

The father never fully recovered from the blow. Nevertheless he undertook in 1883-86 another tour of Australasia and Canada. At Melbourne Mrs. Kennedy-Fraser heard Melba—then Mrs. Armstrong, and an amateur. 'If that is an amateur,' she said to her sister, 'then all the professionals may hide their heads.' Kennedy missed his wife, and wrote to tell her so. She telegraphed from Edinburgh the name of a vessel that was sailing in two days, and joined him at Sydney. The Kennedys were now lionised wherever they appeared. It is a shortcoming of this book that with all the records of countless successful concerts, no very clear idea is given of Kennedy's art or of the music he sang. He died in Canada on the way home.

Before this (in 1882), Marjory had spent some time in Paris studying with Marchesi. One of the most interesting things in the book is her censure of that celebrated teacher's method:

> 'I did not find her teaching sufficiently analytical to be of lasting value. . . . We could thus see the singer who was under the fire of criticism. I watched eagerly, but never found that the teacher really explained in any clear way what was at fault when the tone was wrong, although we could quite well see from the lines of the singer's figure, for instance, that the breathing was bad when the tone was objected to as faulty.'

Between the author's early adventures and her later ones came a long and uneventful spell of teaching at Edinburgh. Mrs. Kennedy-Fraser's work—the work for which she will be long remembered—of collecting Hebridean folk-song began in 1905. She tells here, in some ten short chapters, without much art in the telling perhaps, but with a zest and breeziness that explain the success of her collecting, the story of an enterprise that has added treasures to the store of musical folk-lore—treasures, moreover, that might, but for her, have been lost for good, for even in the bleakest and most primitive of the Hebrides times are changing. The author says that there has probably been more change in the last twenty years than in the previous three hundred. A 'waulking' in which she participated in Barra in 1927, was a somewhat artificial, though still exciting, function. (A 'waulking' is the communal labour of shrinking hand-woven textiles, accompanied by encouraging songs.)

In one of the last chapters Mrs. Kennedy-Fraser tells her famous story of the grey seal at North Bay, Barra, that sang with perfect cantabile, in a beautiful mezzo-soprano voice, in answer to her own singing. In her surprise she would have discredited the evidence of her senses if she had not had the corroboration of two accompanying friends, the Misses Ruth and Maimie Waddell, both musicians. Having a pencil and paper in her hand she noted the creature's melody, and has included it in her collection, although 'folk-song' is, perhaps, not quite the right designation for it.

There is no need to describe in detail Mrs. Kennedy-Fraser's sojourns in the outer isles or her long sittings with the peasant singers, for those who delight in the songs themselves—now available for everyone—will want to read the book. The author is deeply attached to the islands and the islanders, to the point of not even complaining about their weather. Her courage and pertinacity—exemplified in her acquiring Gaelic for her purpose (the Kennedys were English-speaking)—will strike all readers. She contents herself with a narration of her excursions. For a musical dissertation one must go to her song-books.

'Collected Essays.' By W. H. Hadow.

[Oxford University Press, 15*s*.]

Musicians are sometimes heard to express regret that Sir Henry Hadow does not confine his activities to their art; they regard with a grudging eye his almost equal devotion to literature, science, education, and other things that they are apt to forget are no less important, and that also have more or less direct connection with music. For our part we think that Sir Henry's versatility adds weight to his pronouncements on music; they cannot be discounted as the utterances of the mere specialist in an art that has usually been associated with narrowness of outlook. Thus the general reader will attach the more weight to (say) the essay on 'The Place of Music in Life,' or 'Church Music,' seeing that from the same pen comes a penetrating character-study of Iago, and an erudite essay on 'The Use of Comic Episodes in Tragedy.' Six of the eighteen chapters in this book are on non-musical subjects, and the fact ought to be a recommendation to musicians, who as a whole read too little about their own art and even less about others.

It was a bold step to reprint without apparent alteration an essay written in 1906 on 'Some Tendencies in Modern Music,' for the music that was labelled 'modern' a quarter of a century ago is by now either accepted or forgotten. Much of this chapter inevitably reads like prophecy, and on the whole it has 'come off,' though one feels that Parry is rather over-estimated and Elgar the reverse. It is a pity the estimate stops at 'The Apostles' on the choral side and the 'Enigma' Variations on the instrumental.

The Elgar of 1906 had 'not yet found himself,' Hadow felt. The pronouncement makes us wish that this chapter had been followed with a supplement; we want to know whether the author feels that Elgar 'found himself' subsequently in the Symphonies, 'The Kingdom,' the Concertos, 'Falstaff,' the chamber music, and in the long series of admirable choral miniatures.

Church music has a chapter, and is also touched on in the essay on 'The Place of Beauty in Worship.' The Church music paper leads off with a historical survey so closely packed and allusive that it probably baffled the audience on its delivery at a Church congress. Such matter is for reading, and its full value can be taken in only now that the address is reprinted. Every parson and organist should get the book, if only for the sake of these chapters. Above all, let easy-going clergy who pay exaggerated respect to folk who complain of the supersession of a 'favourite tune,' take note of such passages as this:

> 'I would add a word in answer to those who hold that all questions of a standard of beauty and of its application to religious worship are mere matters of personal taste, and that one taste is as worthy of consideration as another. De gustibus non disputandum, they say, forgetting that the world has been continually disputing on matters of taste for some two thousand five hundred years. But in spite of the conflict there have gradually emerged certain principles which seem to be founded partly in human nature and partly in the qualities of the medium employed, and which stand firm amid all the ebb and flow of schools and fashions. . . . It is not conflict, but indifference that we have most to fear; that easy-going slackness which allows bad work in our fabrics and in our services, not because it prefers it or because it could defend it if pressed, but because it pays so little regard that it will not take the trouble to form a judgment. I feel that this is a very common diagnosis, and I believe that it is symptomatic of a very dangerous disease.
> 'During the last fifty years the people of England have been educating themselves to the understanding of beauty and to the higher and purer enjoyment which comes with understanding. Clergy who say that the congregation does not really distinguish are, I believe, making a mistake, the range of which is steadily widening. Those who say that tawdry ornament and trivial tune are attractive and so bring worshippers into the fold may be seriously asked to contemplate how many they are keeping away.'

There is not a page in this book without its stimulating or provocative point; nothing less than another book could discuss it fully. Here are the chapters that have not yet been mentioned: 'Some Aspects of Modern Music,' 'William Byrd,' 'A Croatian Composer' (a reprint of the 1927 brochure on Haydn's indebtedness to Croatian folk-music), 'Beethoven,' 'Brahms,' 'Parry,' 'Music and Drama,' 'A Comparison of Poetry and Music,' 'The Place of Humane Letters in Education,' 'The Place of Music in Humane Letters,' 'Some Landmarks in Education,' and (the only newly-written material) a wise and tolerant glance at present-day musical conditions under the title 'Epilogue.'

If of all Hadow's books this is the best (as we believe it to be), it is so because of its nature. Nothing less than a collection of essays on widely diverse subjects can show to the full the profuse learning and the mellow wisdom of a mind so richly stored, or give full scope to a literary style that can handle so many debateable and abstruse topics with equal lucidity and persuasiveness.

'Angewandte Musikæsthetik.' By Hans Mersmann.

[Berlin: Max Hesse.]

This book is by an author who knows exactly what he is aiming at, and goes straight for it. Æsthetics, he tells us in his Preface, have never been a science, but the expression of men's outlook on life and on the world—an expression that has to be formulated afresh whenever changes in this outlook have taken place. Æsthetics are 'a preparation'; the object of musical æsthetics is not to 'teach,' but to lead people to music.

Dr. Mersmann's procedure is to follow the phenomenological method (phenomenology meaning not psychology in contrast with logic, as it does in Hamilton's 'Lectures,' but simply description without reference to abstract laws governing phenomena or to normative principles of critical assessment). For æsthetics founded on psychology he has no use whatever. He considers musical works as they stand and live, 'apart from all associations and subjective relations, from all philosophical or physiological assumptions, in order to achieve a clear, objective cognition'; and he posits that all problems arising from the study of the elements of music are correlated—that it is no good, e.g., considering rhythm without taking into account its relation to melody and harmony, and so forth.

The ultimate justification of this method lies in the fact that 'the creative artist, when all is said and done, is only the most conspicuous carrier of a force that exists in all of us. Hence, æsthetics should lead up to a point at which the listener no longer stands in contrast to the work, but participates in it, identifies himself with it.'

It is quite true that, as Mr. Lionel Landry puts it in his book 'La Sensibilité Musicale' (of which more anon), the significance of a piece of music is the significance which a listener would ascribe to its melodies, harmonies, and rhythms if he used them to express himself. But whether this desired 'identification' can be brought about by the 'objective' study of musical elements is another matter. There has been some talk of late on the subject of a possible physiology of music, which I think would be very similar to Dr. Mersmann's phenomenology. I cannot help feeling that this order of studies is most instructive when applied to works that have proved their vitality by living; but it does not give any possibility of discriminating between live works and mechanically-contrived imitations. (For a discussion of the point, I beg leave to refer to my article 'Criticism in the Melting Pot,' in the April Dominant.) Dr. Mersmann has achieved remarkable clarity in his definitions, analyses, and statements. He has fully succeeded in his attempt to deal with all the elements of music as correlated. His is the only book I know which, starting from musical facts (melody, harmony, rhythm, colour, working-out, &c.), gives us a real synthesis, an organized whole.

Thereby his book—huge, but not difficult to read—is of genuine interest to students of music. It comes as a valuable complement to treatises of musical analysis and even composition.

A most instructive comparison arises between this book and Landry's 'La Sensibilité Musicale' (Paris, 1927), which proclaims the failure of all attempts to solve the problem of music by reference to 'objective' considerations only, and—taking the exact counterpart of Dr. Mersmann's procedure—posits that the secret of music lies, not in the 'facts' of music, but in the process of action and reaction arising from music actually heard or imagined. That two diametrically opposed views could be upheld with regard to the central problem of musical æsthetics shows how very obscure this problem is.

'The Four-Part Chorals of J. S. Bach.' With the German Text of the Hymns and English Translation. Edited, with an historical Introduction, Notes, and critical Appendices, by Charles Sanford Terry.

[Oxford University Press, Four Guineas; or in two volumes, 42*s*. each; and five volumes, 16*s*. each.]

As an example of scholarship and thoroughness Prof. Terry's latest Bach work can hardly be beaten, even by himself. It contains about five hundred chorals (for the purposes of this review we will follow the author and omit the final 'e'). This is the largest number so far gathered under one cover. They are lavishly set out in regard to space, usually one to each large page.

Not content (as most of us would have been) with having packed a great mass of information into the Historical Introduction, Prof. Terry ends with an Appendix of nearly fifty pages, wherein appear critical notes on the text of every choral! There are also interesting facsimiles, and a fine portrait of Bach. In a word, this is an astonishing book, and a reviewer can do no more and no less than salute it with respect and admiration.

(All the same, we venture to suggest that the author might have given more generous treatment to the edition of the chorals made by Elliot Button and published by Novello a few years ago. His only mention of it is in connection with the inclusion of the words of the hymns. He speaks of the paucity of words in the Bachgesellschaft and Breitkopf editions, and adds: 'the most recent, an English, edition excludes them altogether.' The edition thus cursorily dismissed is, in the matter of textual accuracy and convenience of arrangement, one of the best; yet of all those mentioned by Prof. Terry it is the only one concerning which no information as to editor or publisher is given. This apparent reluctance to give due credit to the efforts of a co-worker in the same field is a small matter, no doubt; nevertheless it is large enough to be a blemish on a monumental achievement. It might be regarded as unpremeditated but for the fact that the author's recent life of Bach, though citing the Peters and Augener editions of the organ music, omits to mention that of Novello—which happens to be the one most suitable for English players because it is unique in giving the tunes and texts on which the Choral Preludes are based, and so is an invaluable guide to their interpretation.)

'Encyclopédie de la Musique et Dictionnaire du Conservatoire.' Second Part, vol. 4.

[Paris: Delagrave.]

This volume is devoted to the history of orchestration and to religious music. Scoring for military bands is efficiently dealt with by M.-A. Soyer, and orchestration by Gabriel Pierné and Henry Woollett jointly. Jules Franck writes on the music of the Synagogue, Eugène Gigout on that of the Roman Church, D.-C. Planchet on the art of the choirmaster, Célestin Bourdeau on Russian Church music, and Pastor Isaac Picard on the music of the Anglican, Lutheran, and Reformed Churches. All this is very useful, but the two defects that had to be mentioned in notices of the previous volumes must again be referred to. There is, unavoidably, a certain lack of proportion in the treatment of the various items. Is it really needful, in a history of orchestration, to devote ten pages to Halévy when three and a half pages only are devoted to Liszt and four to Rimsky-Korsakov? And there still is no index, no possibility of using the book for reference purposes—a state of things which, one understands, will be remedied when the work is complete.

'Cançoner popular de Catalunya.' Vol. 2. By various authors.

[Barcelona: Fundacio Conceptio Rabell i Cibils.]

A superbly produced book, containing the full report of the missions of several song-collectors, a hundred and forty songs, a most scholarly essay by Francesc Pujol on chromaticism, modality, and tonality in Catalonian folk-songs, and another, equally interesting and thorough, by Francesc Baldelló on Gregorian elements in these folk-songs. There are several indices, which render the book invaluable for reference purposes. M.-D. C.

SONGS

There are some interesting issues in this month's batch, among them being settings of three of Mrs. Browning's 'Sonnets from the Portuguese,' by Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco, whose Shakespeare songs attracted attention some time ago. The composer deals carefully and sensitively with the English words—only once or twice are there touches that seem unnatural—and the style of his music is well adapted to the character of the poet's feeling. The kind of free recitative which is shown to advantage, for instance, in 'Letters,' the second of this cycle, is the only way in which lines so declamatory and unlyrical as these can be set. The method is apt to seem cold and artificial if one looks into it very closely, but its effect is telling in performance because the climaxes are well proportioned and spaced, and the music flows consecutively from one 'moment' to the next. This ability to keep something in reserve is well illustrated in 'The sweet sad years,' where the major version of a theme that has already been pretty fully exploited appears effectively at the climax point. The poems are very far from austere in style; the same is true of the music, but neither seems less sincere than the other, and that is saying a good deal. It accounts for the very considerable effect of the songs, and the feeling of unity that is achieved, in the face of some difficulty, between words and music.

The last song, 'Poems and Flowers,' calls for comment. It is based on Chopin's Prelude in G (No. 3—the one with the running bass figure). Above this is fitted (that 's the word) a vocal part which deals very adequately with the poem concerned. This adequacy is an interesting comment on the composer's attitude to his words, and illustrates the tendency to coldness and artificiality of which I spoke. Some such attitude there is bound to be in an artist's exercise of skill, but when the skill is used in obedience to strong impulse artificiality vanishes. There was skill enough when Parry set the line 'Oh, may we soon again renew that song': but when we sing it we are as unconscious of technical matters as Parry must have been, when the tune first flowered in a mind accustomed to thinking of fine poetry and thinking of it in terms of music. This song of Castelnuovo-Tedesco's seems too much of a feat, and does too much violence to the Chopin original. The interpolation of a considerable passage just before the end of the song, a passage necessary to the accommodation of the words, but somewhat unrelated in style to the rest of the work, is scarcely justifiable, except on the ground that necessity knows no law—if this be justification. The song is not up to the level of the two earlier ones, which deserve a better finish than this last gives the cycle (Chester).

There is some beautiful sound in van Dieren's 'Rondel,' just issued by the Oxford University Press, and the whole thing is of a beautiful coolness and clarity of effect which I take to be one of its points of contact with the 'Style de Gravure d'après la manière de Moreau' to which the composer refers. In order to achieve this effect, presumably, van Dieren has dropped here that attempt to achieve perfect poetical rhythm and accentuation which made other of his work difficult and sometimes ineffective. From some points of view this is a great gain, and those who have failed to appreciate his other songs may be able to get in touch with him by means of this attractive and more approachable work.

The same press sends four songs by Ivor Gurney, one at least of which is of first-rate quality. 'The Twa Corbies' undoubtedly hesitates once or twice in the middle; there are one or two signs of immaturity, but these are completely lost in the vividness and sweep of the thing as a whole. The climax is one of real power, and the descent from it enhances and clinches its effect. The D natural on 'The wind sall blaw' is chilling to hear. The composer must have had that intense and abnormal realisation of the poem which is the basis of a good song; he succeeds in expressing his vision, and even if the work just fails to attain complete unity, it is a fine thing. The other songs are much smaller in scope. 'The fields are full' has the right autumnal richness of texture; 'Walking Song' is frank and fresh; 'Severn Meadows' is quiet and sad. Here again there is the authentic touch, an emotional effect produced by a style that seems one with the impulse in which the song had its origin.

There is atmosphere in Edmund Duncan-Rubbra's 'A Duan of Barra' (Oxford University Press), and a kind of carefully-attained monotony of colour. At first the music seems too sophisticated for the words; but it is not so, for nothing could be more sophisticated than the pseudo-simplicity of this kind of Irish verse. (This is to say not that the poem is insincere, but that it is far from simple, which it rather pretends to be.) In both this song and 'Dear Liza' (Curwen), a singing-game for boy and girl, with accompaniment by the same composer, the most striking feature is an undoubted cleverness.

Two effective and unpretentious songs from Murdoch are G. R. Stratton's 'Boot, saddle, to horse,' and Ivor Davies's 'Swallow, hither wing.' Both derive their effect from their frankness of outlook and lack of self-consciousness; there is no attempt at originality, but in the first a vitality of rhythm and texture and a good climax, and in the second a graceful melodic sense.

More ambitious are Francesco Santoliquido's 'Il poema della morte' and Havergal Brian's 'Why dost thou wound and break my heart,' both published by Chester. The latter 'dates' very much (it is marked 'Copyright, 1913'), but its sincerity still tells, as well as the sense of musical effect that went to the making of it. It is not, however, always happy in its treatment of Herrick's words, which are sacrificed more than once for the benefit of the composer's rhythmic scheme.

Some good reprints are issued: Joseph Williams sends Purcell's 'Mad Tom' and Bishop's 'The Mocking Bird,' both edited by Dawson Freer. To the excellent Oxford University Press series of standard songs are added Brahms's 'Lullaby,' Rossini's 'Largo al factotum,' Haydn's 'My mother bids me bind my hair,' Stradella's 'O Lord, have mercy' ('Pietà, Signore'), and 'O Star of Eve,' from 'Tannhäuser.' The editor is Steuart Wilson, and the songs, with first-rate print and paper, sell at 1*s.* 6*d.* T. A.

PIANOFORTE

An interesting and able work on a biggish scale is Stan Golestan's 'Theme, Variations, Danse,' published by Durand. The composer shows ability beyond the ordinary in keeping his variations logical even when their treatment of the theme is highly imaginative and almost rhapsodic. The theme is one, apparently, of slender possibilities, but it proves suggestive to the composer. The music is lyrical and fairly light in character, and perhaps more extended than the material justifies; the composer's sense of design and firmness of touch are felt, however, throughout the work. In these times of over-elaborate music, one appreciates stuff as direct as this, in which there is no attempt to confuse issues or make a great fuss over a small matter. It is not many writers of modern pianoforte music who dare state their argument in simple terms and let it take its chance; one has to be sure of one's logic and the quality of one's ideas to do that; and it is creditable to the present composer that his variations are able to stand a severe test so well. T. A.

VIOLIN

Albert Roussel's 'Segovia,' transcribed by L. Heymann (Durand), makes a brilliant, short encore piece. The translator has overcome very cleverly the difficulties of a particularly thankless job, for this music does not exist apart from its superficial but able setting. Léon Roques, faced with an easier task in the transcription of Debussy's 'La Fille aux Cheveux de Lin' (Durand), has been less successful. The pizzicato in octaves pp at the end seems particularly unsatisfactory. So high on the E string a pizzicato pp becomes more noise than sound. F. B.

PIANOFORTE AND VIOLIN SONATAS

J. Guy Ropartz's third Sonata, in A major (Durand), commands respect in many ways. It is clear; the harmonic scheme reveals unquestionable deftness, and the construction shows a good sense of proportion. Yet one reaches the last notes with a sense of having missed something. The slow movement especially seems unsubstantial, unimportant. The fault may be in ourselves, unable to see the work as the composer would have us see it; it may be the composer's—if he has not sufficient temperament to force his point of view on us. It remains to see what effect the Sonata may produce when handled by two expert performers. It has many points which players of genius might drive home with force and, perhaps, with conviction.

There is more substance and more temperament in the third Sonata of Arnold Bax (Murdoch). If Bax would only clarify a little his structure he has talents that must carry him far. His ideas are always musical, and a breath of poetry pervades every page. But he is restless; the pace may change from quick to slow, but there is no relaxation in the feeling of tension, of strenuousness, which in the end might become tiresome, and is certainly prejudicial to the effect.

The music of P. de Bréville, as shown in his second Sonata (Rouart, Lerolle) should appeal to those who believe that progress is only possible in going back literally to the idioms of the past. He concludes with eight good, honest chords of C major, and throughout these five movements there is not a bar which does not proclaim the hearty, downright, plain-spoken workman who says what he means and no more. No doubt critics accustomed to the whims and subtleties of the present day will demur at his transparent simplicity. The most exacting, however, will not fail to applaud his courage. F. B.

FLUTE AND PIANOFORTE

It is right that a Sonatine should be not only a smaller but also a slighter structure than a Sonate. Henri Sanguet, however, tends to go to extremes in his Sonatine for flute and pianoforte (Rouart, Lerolle). There is all the difference in the world between a work for children and a childish work. The composer has achieved simplicity, but has not always avoided futility. He has moments of charm and also moments when the interest is not upheld by fancy or skill. An unequal work. F. B.

STRING QUARTETS

Of the two quartets received last month, the first, by H. Waldo Warner, is an essay 'in the olden style' (J. Fischer, New York); the second, by Bernard van Dieren, an essay in the very modern style (Oxford University Press). Beyond question it is van Dieren's work that the musician will find more interesting. Essays 'in the olden style' have very clear limitations; however ably the old idioms are used, the effect must inevitably be that of a copy. There are, however, copies and copies, and Mr. Waldo Warner deserves some praise for a slick piece of work which must undoubtedly find favour with the average audience.

I am not so sure that the average audience would be equally pleased with van Dieren's Quartet, which, for all its cleverness and downright honest workmanship, does not avoid monotony. This, at least, is an impression derived from a reading of the score, and it is possible that after a hearing or two it may have to be modified. But is it not asking too much of a mere fiddler to direct him to play ' with a sweet irony, discreetly ' ? Can there be such a difference in the playing of a scale of A major in semiquavers and in a quick tempo that the composer's intention will be realised by the player and understood by the listener ? I mention it only because it seems part and parcel of van Dieren's habit—or, shall I say, temperament—which inclines to rely too much on small or far-fetched ideas and to lose sight of essentials. One can easily understand—nay, sympathise with—the desire for rhythmic freedom ; but its abuse results in shapelessness, and shapelessness may lead to monotony.

ORGAN

A Passacaglia in C minor inevitably suggests comparison with the example in that key ; composers should, in self-defence, write in one of the others. Paul Geilsdorf's venture is a sound work on traditional lines. He doesn't avail himself of the licence used by some contemporaries who ease their task by change of key, or by treating the subject, or part of it, enharmonically. His one departure from the ancient rigour is the adoption of the tonic major for the final treatment. The work is fairly difficult, and always in true organ style (C. F. Kahnt, Leipsic).

A telling Postlude for Easter is Gordon Slater's ' An Easter Alleluya,' founded on the familiar ' Lasst uns Erfreuen.' I like its diatonic character—three of its four pages are entirely without accidentals ; and the canonic treatment to which the tune lends itself is not overdone. The writing is clean and good throughout. Difficulty : easy to moderate (Oxford University Press).

Mark Pasteur's Prelude on Gibbons's ' Song lxvii.' (set to ' Give me the wings of faith,' in the English Hymnal) shows a genuine feeling for mood and style. Some consecutive fifths and irregular barring are in the present fashion, but add little to the effect. The delivery of the tune in long notes against fragments of itself in diminution is well done. The piece is easy, and its meditative and improvisatory character make it an excellent voluntary where something quiet is needed (Stainer & Bell).

William Faulkes's ' Fantasia on Old Welsh Airs ' should become a popular concert piece. The tunes are good, and are treated in a straightforward and effective way. The piece is only moderately difficult (Paxton). From Paxton's comes also a good arrangement by J. Stuart Archer of Scarlatti's well-known Pastorale in D minor.

Two more sets of Three Short Postludes by Arthur G. Colborn have been received from Weekes—simple, well-written pieces, of no marked originality.

From W. Bessel, Paris, come a pair of transcriptions by L. de Saint-Martin—Rimsky-Korsakov's ' Flight of the bumble-bee ' and Moussorgsky's ' At the gate of Kieff,' from the ' Pictures at an Exhibition.' The former would ' come off ' on an organ of prompt speech and in a building with little echo ; it calls for a few light stops and a deft finger. The other piece is so laid out that it would sound shrill on an organ poor in foundation tone. The frequent duplication of the bass by the pedal and left hand is a weak feature.

Organ duets have never had much vogue, partly, no doubt, because of the complications brought about by two players pedalling. A series of duets just started gets over this difficulty by giving all the footwork to the secondo ; and the manual work is so shared that the primo is generally well up out of the way. This interesting venture has for arrangers and editors Clarence Dickinson and Charlotte Matthewson Lockwood, and so far four numbers have appeared—Hesse's Fantasia and Fugue in C minor, the March from ' The Ruins of Athens,' ' The Ride of the Valkyries,' and Saint-Saëns's ' Danse Macabre.' The idea is good, and (so far as can be judged without actual trial) seems to be well carried out. It will enable a good pianist to co-operate with an organist in the performance of orchestral works that are ineffective in pianoforte transcription or as organ solo, but which, given four hands, two feet, and ample registration resources, should be highly effective (H. W. Gray : Novello).

Enrico Bossi was an esteemed organ composer whose music was invariably tuneful and direct. His ' Meditation in a Cathedral,' a posthumous work just issued by Schirmer, shows him depending much on changes of time, and on bell effects. The general result is rather disjunct and restless. An organ with ample registration facilities is needed for its proper effect. The style is mostly quiet, working up to a big ending. But most organists will prefer the Bossi of their youth.

Two new pieces by Alfred Hollins should be noted by recitalists. ' Siciliana ' is a graceful number, quite easy to play, and giving scope for tasteful use of soft stops. The composer has wisely indicated little more than degrees of power, but obviously a change of stop should be made for the repeats. The companion piece, a Bourrée, should become popular by reason of its tunefulness and vigour—the latter quality, however, never being allowed to take off from the lightness and spring of the rhythm. The middle section—corresponding to the Trio—is a charming example of three-part writing. Though very telling in effect, this capital piece is not difficult, only one pedal passage calling for some dexterity (Novello).

H. G.

PART-SONGS FOR CHILDREN'S AND FEMALE VOICES

Spofforth's ' Hail ! smiling morn ' is now issued in two parts, the lower going down only to middle C. There is room for well-varied tone-levels, and a fine cres. when ' darkness flies away.' This is a useful ballad for teaching precision in six-eight time.

Alfred Moffat has arranged a group of old songs (each issued separately). There is ' The Pedlar ' (Old English), ' Many Roads ' (Old Dutch), ' Feeding Time ' (French), ' The Irish Schoolmaster ' (from a pipe tune), ' Twilight Shadows ' (Alsatian), and ' Rain in May.' The words of most of these are by Kate R. Moffat. The first is sturdy and steady, with some gently-running quavers for the lower part. The Dutch song goes Andantino, in six-eight, with one or two easy chromatics. ' Feeding Time ' is nattily busy (G minor, mostly even quavers ; to be brightly pattered, but not staccato). The Irish piece is a humorous duet with chorus, or it may be sung in two parts, full throughout. The characters are schoolmaster and boy. It would be a pleasant diversion at a terminal concert. The hit about Pharaoh's daughter, who ' was a milkmaid, and took a profit from the water,' is ancient, but still worth tasting. 'Twilight Shadows' moves in placid slow waltz-time, dreamily sustained. 'Rain in May' has a rather monotonous tune, that perhaps is meant to suit the theme. It clings too much round one or two chords.

Eric Thiman sets 'Sister, awake!' as a two-part canon. It flows and swings broadly, using a triplet figure effectively. Tone from mf to ff is wanted, clear and ringing. Two s.s.c. trios by Ethel Boyce are entitled respectively 'Persephone' (words by the composer) and 'The Rainbow' (words from Ecclesiasticus). The endings of phrases at bar-ends in the first song need careful attention, if they are not to sound abrupt. Words and music are well mated, the former having slightly the surer impulse. A choir with plenty of vitality and colour-sense could make this swell up inspiritingly. 'The Rainbow' sings the praise of the power of God in a dignified way, with several changes of mood and pace. This should be remembered when an anthem for boys and women, or women only, is wanted.

All the above are published by Novello.

MALE-VOICE

Three songs by Kenneth Finlay are published by three different firms. Stainer & Bell issue 'Winter winds have chilled our bones,' a carol for choir or quartet, with a good lift in it, and rhythmic niceties—a fair test for a festival quartet class, and still more effective at the mouths of a deft, smallish choir. Williams publishes Mr. Finlay's new setting of 'Crossing the Bar'—a song which, one supposes, may well be reset every twenty or thirty years. This is a little more elaborate and harmonically striking than the old ones we know. A good rich tone should make it rightly impressive. It marches well, not too stiffly. 'Scotland Yet' is an arrangement of Peter McLeod's tune to Scott Riddell's words. Scots folk will sing it with the deepest fervour; the rest can enjoy the imaginative feat of treading the heather—if they do not mind drinking a cup to a land now wickedly talking of Home Rule.

UNISON

Ursula Greville's 'An English Posy' is a collection of twenty-four songs, most of them unfamiliar. Of these, seven have been composed by the editor. The others have old airs, that Maurice Jacobson has adapted, and for which he has written simple accompaniments. These pianoforte parts at times lack rhythmic interest, though usually they are adequate, and always keep within the powers of fairly mild amateurs. Herman Ould has written some new poems for old tunes, and Whyte Monk has here and there adapted old words. The older composers include Carey, Charles I., H. Lawes, Lock, Leveridge, and other more or less familiar friends. Miss Greville's muse moves within rather restricted tonal bounds, and some of her progressions are not of the strongest. The bass might sometimes be reconsidered, in its relation to the tune. There is a certain bold strength in the outlines, and one or two of the moods are pleasantly caught. On the whole, however, it is not quite judicious to mingle so large a proportion of an editor's music with that of such old hands as are here assembled. The book costs 3*s.* 6*d.* (edition with tunes and words only, in Staff and Sol-fa, 6*d.*) (Curwen).

George Rathbone's latest songs are 'The Dustman's Call' (Allegretto, misterioso), 'Robin on the Apple Tree,' flitting lightly, a pretty miniature, and 'Adventure,' marked 'for boys,' and rightly bluff and bold. Margaret G. Rhodes has a good knack of writing words that chime with children's fancies. These three songs hit the mark (Novello).

'Nursery Rhyme Quadrilles' take us back to quieter days. Louise Edwards-Carter has arranged these to traditional music, and Mabel Chamberlain has edited them. They are for quite small children. If simultaneous dancing and singing be objected to, one part of the class can undertake each of these pleasures, and a change-over at half-time will give both sides each kind of happy exercise. Good action-songs are not very common (or, at least, the good ones are not too well known, as adjudicators at Festivals find sometimes by sad experience). This group of eight (price 1*s.*) should be noted and secured (Novello).

W. R. A.

Dr. Whittaker continues his edition of instrumental movements from Bach's Cantatas with the fine, jubilant Sonata from 'Der Himmel lacht, die Erde jubilieret' (three trumpets, three oboes, cor anglais, optional bassoon, drums, and strings), the two Sinfonias to 'Geist und Seale wird verwirret,' the first for strings, two oboes, and keyboard obbligato, the second for strings (optional oboes) and keyboard (Oxford University Press).

Thomas F. Dunhill has hit on the happy idea of scoring for strings five pieces from the Anna Magdalena Clavier Book—the March in D, two Polonaises, two Minuets, and a Musette, the result being labelled 'The Anna Magdalena Suite.' It should be in great request with amateur and school string bands (Oxford University Press).

Music in the Foreign Press

DVORÁK'S OPERAS

In the Signale (March 20), S. Brichta calls attention to Dvorák's eight operas, among which he considers the most characteristic 'Dimitry' (belonging to the composer's early period) and 'The Russalka' (belonging to the late period). Dvorák, he says, was not gifted with a dramatic sense equal to Smetana's, but is the typical 'Bohemian musician,' spontaneous rather than self-critical.

MOUSSORGSKY

In the February Anbruch, Hans Redlich compares the genuine text of Moussorgsky's 'Songs and Dances of Death' (first published this year by the Russian State Publishing Department) with the text, revised by Rimsky-Korsakov, that was the only one hitherto known. His conclusion is that Rimsky-Korsakov's emendations are deplorable.

A curious feature of this article is that its author absolutely ignores the spade-work done in Moussorgsky's favour in countries outside Germany; e.g., he is altogether unaware that more than twenty years ago many French critics were acquainted with the 1874 edition of 'Boris Godunov,' and protested vehemently against the revised editions of that masterpiece.

ERIK SATIE

In the same issue, H. Stuckenschmidt writes in high praise of Erik Satie, describing 'Parade' and 'Socrate' as masterpieces.

MUSICAL CRITICISM

The March Melos contains a number of utterances on musical criticism by various writers. There is not much to be gleaned from these. Hans Eisler calls attention to the awkward position of minor critics on the staff of big newspapers, who must perforce follow the lead of the critic in chief:

'If the critic in chief is, say, a partisan of "Romanticism," the critic in second can hardly extol the "New Pragmatism." It is not that the editor wishes to quell the individuality of the critic in second: but order must reign; and from the point of view of business, it would be absurd to give readers, every week, two or three conflicting points of view.'

THE LUTE

The March Revue Musicale contains an essay on the history of the lute, by P. Lang:

'The lute, during the 16th century, played the part which the pianoforte plays nowadays in the home, and held a great place in orchestras. It was deprived of one of its functions owing to improvement of keyboard instruments, of the other owing to the advent of the violin. Its reign ended with the 17th century. Has it vanished for ever? The long-forgotten guitar has reconquered a place in the sun; a renaissance of the lute would be an excellent thing, for this instrument is essentially noble, and admits of neither triviality nor coarseness.'

MODERN ORGAN-BUILDING IN FRANCE

In the same issue, Norbert Dufourcq considers organ-building in France from the 16th century to the present day, and shows that the 20th-century organ reverts to the old timbres (missing in 19th-century organs), and has many useful new devices.

VERDI'S LETTERS TO A LIBRETTIST

In the same issue, J.-G. Prodhomme publishes, in a French translation, letters from Verdi to Du Locle, written during the years 1868-74.

JAZZ

In L'Ami du Peuple (a Paris daily, March 26), Jacques Janin writes:

'So long as jazz is kept to the music-hall, well and good; but when it crops up on the concert-platform the time comes to discuss it. And we see at once that jazz is mere "crowd-music,' impersonal, devoid of all individuality, incredibly monotonous. Originality cannot be achieved by means of a cackling saxophone or a coughing trombone: it is the outcome of an individual mind and character. All jazz manufacturers are alike except as regards the quantity of spice they use. In Jack Hylton's programmes the composers' names are not even given!'

CRITICS IN TROUBLE

In Das Orchester (March 1), Robert Hernried writes:

'Franz Schreker, Paul Hindemith, and Kurt Weill, who considered themselves hurt by Adolf Weissmann's notices, appeared one fine day at the editorial office of the Berliner Zeitung am Mittag and asked that Weissmann should henceforth refrain from writing on their music. Dr. Ullstein did not agree; but, curiously, Weissmann promised to comply with the request. The next day the editor protested against this concession. It is a pity that Weissmann, by agreeing, should have acknowledged himself in the wrong.'

[Of course, Weissmann's agreement may be interpreted in more ways than one; it has happened before that a similar retort to an indignant composer's request has made the composer eat humble-pie.—M.-D. C.]

Hernried also recounts that Otto Klemperer has asked the Vossische Zeitung to dismiss its musical critic, Max Marschalk, using terms so threatening that, apparently, the editor pointed out that 'should any mishap occur to Marschalk, Klemperer would be in a rather awkward position.'

A PROTECTIVE CENSORSHIP FOR MUSIC

In the same periodical (March 15), Robert Hernried describes a discussion of the above topic at the Prussian Academy of Arts:

'Several speakers were against censorship in any form, but Dr. Hans Joachim Moser declared that art stood in need of some kind of protection. He protested against the use on the stage of impersonation of men of genius such as Schubert or Goethe, against "misproductions" of the classics, against the parodies of great music that occur in jazz, and against the misuse of musical masterpieces in cinema performances. He stated, with unfeigned indignation, that he had recently heard, among other things: Accompanying the picture of President Hindenburg visiting the Sports Exhibition—the "Freischütz" Overture; accompanying the picture of the signing of the Treaty between the Vatican and the King of Italy—the opening bars of the slow movement of Bach's Double Concerto; and accompanying the picture of the last stage of a boxing contest—the "Ride of the Valkyries."'

A MONTEVERDI BIBLIOGRAPHY

The February Bolletino Bibliografico Musicale contains a bibliography of Monteverdi's works, covering ancient and modern editions. Malipiero, we are told, is now preparing a book on Monteverdi and an edition of his collected correspondence.

OLD CZECH MUSIC

The February Auftakt is devoted to the little-known subject of Old Czech Music. It contains essays on Nikolaus Herman (1490-1561), by M. Kaufmann and Dr. H. Sturm; on Josef Kohout (an 18th-century composer of operas, who worked in France after deserting to avoid military service), by Dr. J. Branberger; and on various other topics. One, by Dr. R. Haas, on old musical plays produced at Eger, gives the bill of a comic opera, 'Der Travestirte Hamlet,' the music by Gabler, produced, probably, in 1806, and now lost.

A POLISH MUSICAL QUARTERLY

The first issue of the Kwartalnik Muzyczny, published at Warsaw under the joint editorship of A. Chybinsky and K. Sikorsky, contains a variety of useful materials, including articles on 15th-century Polish hymns by M. Szczepanska; on the works of Marcin Mielczewsky (ob. 1651), by A. Chybinsky; on Chopin's Sonatas, by H. Opiensky; and on Polish musical culture, by S. Furmanik.

JEAN DESFONTAINES

In the February Revue de Musicologie, Carl Allan Moberg describes a Pastorale of 1688,

'Le Désespoir de Tircis,' preserved in manuscript at Upsal. The music is by Jean Desfontaines, a composer unknown even to Eitner, but who wrote, André Tessier informs us in a further article, many songs printed in Ballard's 'Recueil d'Airs Sérieux et à Boire,' and in similar publications. He has also written Motets and Cantatas, and would constitute an interesting object of study.

OLD HUNGARIAN CHORAL SCORES

In the February Zeitschrift für Musikwissenschaft, Benedikt Szabolcsi describes a curious system for the notation of choral music current in Hungary in the 18th century. Examples were preserved in manuscripts now in the Sárospatak Library.

Gramophone Notes

BY 'DISCUS'

H.M.V.

For once in a way, the best of the batch is operatic—a group of extracts from 'The Twilight of the Gods,' some recorded at Berlin, some in London. I put first 'Hagen bids the vassals prepare for feasting,' by the Berlin State Opera Orchestra and chorus, under Leo Blech. The soloist is Ivar Andressen, a splendid bass. The chorus is a big factor in a fine and stirring record (D1579). No less good in its quieter way is the disc bearing 'Rhinemaidens foretell Siegfried's death' and 'Rhinemaidens beg Siegfried to give up the ring.' The Siegfried is Laubenthal, and the Rhinemaidens are de Garnos, Kindeamann, and Marker. The results are strikingly vivid (D1582). The other record made at Berlin is a fine one of the Siegfried Funeral March, Karl Muck being the conductor (D1585). It must be confessed that the four English recordings are somewhat pale in comparison with those discussed above. In the Norns' Scene the three singers lack colour and conviction (D1572); far better are a couple of scenes with Brunnhilde and Siegfried, wherein Austral is at the top of her form, and Widdop sings well, though his voice lacks the size and heroic character of Laubenthal's (D1574). In the record 'Siegfried takes the oath on Hagen's spear,' Austral and Widdop are heard again, with specially good marks for the former (D1579). Finally, Austral has the field to herself in the scene where Brunnhilde lights the pyre and rides into it (D1587). The orchestra in the English performances is the L.S.O., and the conductor Albert Coates.

After these Wagner extracts, some from Donizetti and early Verdi sound faded. Gigli sings 'Tomb of my sainted father,' from 'Lucia di Lammermoor,' and 'Wild my dream of youth,' from 'Traviata.' His mezza-voce is delightful, and far more expressive than the over-used sobbing catch in the breath. So lachrymose an effect ought to be saved for exceptional moments, or it becomes cheap and even ludicrous. Except for this, he sings finely (DB1222).

Dusolina Giannini is less convincing in 'Mother, compassionate Virgin,' from 'La forza del destino,' and some of her high notes are decidedly shrill (DB1217).

McCormack reaches his lowest level in choice of songs with 'Sonny boy' and 'Jeannine, I dream of lilac time,' a couple of so-called 'theme songs' from the cinema. No wonder that the old reproach concerning the taste and musicianship of singers dies hard! (DA1027).

Of the orchestral records I like best a couple of extracts from 'Carmen'—'Soldiers changing guard' and 'March of the smugglers,' played with the right zest and point by the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Stokowski (D1618).

Two vividly contrasted sides of Ravel are shown in a record of 'Five o'clock,' from 'L'Enfant et les sortilèges' (arranged by Branga), and the 'Pavana pour une Infante défunte,' conducted by Piero Coppola (D1564).

Alfred Hertz and the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra hustle the 'Midsummer Night's Dream' Overture. The Scherzo is given a better pace, but on the whole neither of these performances and reproductions is up to the best English level (D1626-27).

Backhaus continues the recording of Chopin's Studies with three from Op. 25—C sharp minor, G flat, and B minor. His playing is as good as ever, but the tone shows a falling-off in quality—which is probably not his fault (DB1180).

The Bach-Liszt Organ Prelude and Fugue in A minor is played by Mischa Levitzki with beautiful clarity, but with overmuch use of very soft tone; it doesn't fit music of such sustained vigour. He starts considerably more slowly than would an organist. But then organists are almost always far more straightforward in their handling of this type of work. They are probably right, too, for the essence of such music is growth and continuity, and too much variety of pace and subtlety of nuance take off from both these qualities (D1619).

There are a couple of excellent violin records. Marjorie Hayward plays the Massenet 'Meditation' with warm expression. It is a pity she has chosen such a poor companion piece—a feeble Poem by Fibich (B2938).

Heifitz makes a delicious thing of Debussy's 'Girl with the golden hair,' plays 'On wings of song' with rich tone, and in Grieg's Scherzo-Impromptu is irresistibly and uncannily deft. All the same it is too showy (DB1246).

A batch of Church choir records have arrived rather belatedly, and must be dealt with in a few lines. The Choir of Westminster Abbey is heard in Stanford's Te Deum in B flat. There is something odd about this record—or at all events about the sample sent for review. The first side gives an effect far too faint and remote to be of interest; on being reversed, the record proves to be one of the best I have ever heard. The tone and balance are excellent, and the power ample. For once in a way, too, the organ accompaniment is the real thing (B2911). I care less for the record of the same singers in Morley's 'Nolo mortem peccatoris' and Mozart's 'Ave Verum.' They sound too spasmodic in the first and too uniformly loud in the second (but again the recording may be partly responsible). I like the tone of the boys very much; it is fresh and natural (B2892).

The Westminster Cathedral Choir is also recorded, and inevitably one makes comparisons. I can't say good things about the music of the Benediction service—very ordinary hymn-tunes and a dullish Motet by Eslava (C1611).

A couple of Byrd Motets are a better test. The 'Ave Regina' opens far too jerkily by the trebles, and I feel that the pace throughout is too quick. The fine 'Ave Verum' is better in every way—deeply expressive, and with the right note of urgency in the climaxes. The poignant discords—where Byrd writes F sharp against F natural and again B flat against B natural—seem to be toned down somewhat, but that may be a matter of recording (C1606). There are excellent men's voices in this choir, especially in the bass department, but I very much prefer the Abbey boys. The Cathedral treble tone is too hooty, and even 'Amen' comes out as 'Oomoo.'

There should have been another Abbey record for notice, but something went wrong in the labelling. Record C1612 is supposed to give on one side Stanford's 'Glorious and powerful God,' sung in the Abbey, and on the other a portion of the Benediction sung in the Cathedral. Probably both sides ought to be concerned with the Abbey Choir, but actually the record is a duplicate of C1611 noticed above. As I have no catalogue at hand I must leave the tangle unresolved.

COLUMBIA

'The Fire Bird' is nothing if not vivid, and my complaint about the records made by the Paris Orchestre Symphonique, under the direction of Stravinsky himself, is that they fall a bit short in this respect. There seems to be too little power contrast as well. Oddly, I fancy the 'Duo-Art' rolls of the composer playing the pianoforte transcription gives us more of the right effect. This recording is good, then, but not superlative, as it ought to be, seeing that Stravinsky's orchestration is of the kind that reproduces well (L2279-82). By the way, the label and catalogue speak of Prince Ivan marrying the Fire Bird, instead of the Princess.

The vivid qualities lacking in 'The Fire Bird' are present in a couple of records of 'The Three-cornered Hat,' played by the Madrid Symphony Orchestra under Arbos. The extracts are 'Dance of the Neighbours,' the Miller's Dance (9683), and the Final Dance (9864).

Excellent, too, are records of Weber's 'Invitation to the Waltz' (Basle Symphony Orchestra—Weingartner: 9691), and the Overture to 'Semiramide' and Intermezzo from 'Cavalleria Rusticana' (Milan Symphony Orchestra—Lorenzo Molajoli: 9663-64).

I put on Gershwin's Pianoforte Concerto in F with an open mind, having read much of its brilliance, daring, originality, and other qualities that, with luck, we may find occasionally blended in one masterpiece. Musicians sometimes debate earnestly as to which is preferable—good bad music or bad good music. (I haven't space to give examples; most readers will understand the distinction.) Gershwin's Concerto strikes me as being midway between the two, with a bias towards the bad good music class. It is desperately poor in thematic material; of development there is far too little (the composer's obvious inability to make his music grow is thus naïvely alluded to in the descriptive leaflet: 'This part may be considered as equivalent to the usual development section, though it consists very largely of new material'). Amusing, too, is the following about 'a remarkable pianoforte passage in which the left hand repeats a figure consisting of four consecutive chromatic fifths—an utterly revolutionary passage that is, however, justified by its effectiveness.' Bless the writer's innocent heart! So far from being 'utterly revolutionary,' such progressions are by way of becoming threadbare. There are plenty of piquant effects, but the more we hear of them the less they count. In a long work nothing can take the place of good thematic material treated with resource and freshness; and Gershwin is not yet able to deliver the goods. I prefer him as a writer of good jazz to a compounder of bad music in cyclic form. The players are Paul Whiteman's Concert Orchestra and Roy Bargy, whose work at the keyboard is tip-top. The recording is exceptionally good (9665-67).

Another 'serious' work by a dance-music composer and player is Billy Mayerl's 'Sennen Cove,' a tone-poem dealing with a spot on the Cornish coast. This is less pretentious than the Gershwin Concerto, and is all the better for that. The storm section is rather tame, but as a whole this is a fair sample of unoriginal light music. It certainly does not give Mr. Mayerl 'a real standing among serious composers,' as is claimed in the catalogue. The composer conducts, and the players are the Court Symphony Orchestra (9688).

Some important chamber-music records have turned up. The Capet String Quartet play Beethoven's A minor. I don't think they get the size of this immense work. There is much refined, tasteful playing, but too little variety and range of power. The real test in this Quartet is, perhaps, the Thanksgiving movement. Only the very best playing can prevent it from seeming both dull and too long; it seems so in this recording. There are a few shakinesses in ensemble, which in so lengthy and exacting a work may be overlooked. More serious is the meagreness of tone generally, and the lack of vitality in the softer passages. This defect is so marked as to make me suggest that the blame should go to the recording rather than to the performing (L2272-76).

On a far higher plane are two Léner recordings—Mozart's B flat Quartet (K458) and Haydn's D major, Op. 76, No. 5. Here we have vitality in abundance and variety almost in excess—though one hesitates to find any fault in the latter respect, seeing how frequently performances fall short therein. It is a toss-up between these two delightful sets, both in regard to music and performance. I will only say that I should like the spin of the coin to favour the Haydn, if only for the sake of the delightful Finale. The Mozart is on L2261-63; the Haydn, L2257-59.

The Léner party are at their best again in Mozart's Clarinet Quartet in A, wherein they are joined by Charles Draper, who is also at his best. More need not be said (L2252-55).

The Vienna Male-Voice Choir has nothing 'on' our representative English men's choirs, judging from the record of their singing in Schubert's 'Die Nacht' and 'Der Tanz.' The nuancing is gusty, and the intake of breath so audible and violent that I found myself thinking of a kind of communal vacuum cleaner at work, dust and scraps of paper being swiftly absorbed at each inspiration (9611).

Master Trevor Schofield has a first-rate voice and a musical temperament, but he shows some bad faults in his singing of songs by Eric Coates and P. B. Harding. He scoops in attack—in fact, it is less an attack than a stealthy approach; his tone is unsteady, and the style is too sophisticated (the charm of a boy's singing is its boyishness). His top notes are excellent—well produced and controlled. With a better method and style he will be a first-rate singer (5258).

Fried Ignaz Friedmann plays a rather dull Minuet by Suk, and Chopin's Berceuse. He is too loud in the latter, making it a really rousing affair—just the thing to help a reluctant youngster out of bed on a cold morning (L2260).

Are we in for a 'Traviata' boom? There are signs that way, among them being the issue of a pretty complete version in fifteen records, with album and a sensible English version by Compton Mackenzie. The performers are Italian—a fervid team of soloists, vividly backed up by the La Scala (Milan) chorus and orchestra, conducted by Lorenzo Molajoli. The famous old opera is thus given the best of chances of pleasing its old admirers and of making new ones (9269-83).

NATIONAL GRAMOPHONIC SOCIETY

The Society has rarely, if ever, done anything better than its recording of Mozart's delightful Quintet for oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon, and pianoforte, with a star team of performers—Leon Goossens, Frederick Thurston, Aubrey Brain, J. Alexandra, and Kathleen Long. Wind instruments, especially wood, almost invariably reproduce well, and the results here are quite up to standard. As the keyboard is well handled with regard to balance, the set is of unusual merit (N.G.S.121-123).

Player-Piano Notes

BLÜTHNER

As there is no supplementary list this month, here are notes on a few rolls selected from the general catalogue. All these rolls are available in the Blüthner Circulating Library.

Schütt is not often heard, though his music is of the good light type, and much of it is well worth a hearing. He is unfashionable, and has never been markedly popular. For those who don't know him already here is a good opportunity of sampling his work in 'Carnaval Mignon,' two rolls containing a delightful suite of six short pieces all well played by Severin Eisenberger (53055-56).

Two Grieg rolls proved interesting—the Ballade in G minor and one of the Lyrische Stücke ('At your feet,' Op. 68, No. 3). The Ballade runs the gamut of the emotions from grave to gay and back again, and Godowsky's name as the artist is sufficient guarantee of the excellence of its performance (51846). The other piece is sympathetically played by Gustav Riemann (50179).

There is little left to say of so well-known and oft-performed a work as the Liszt transcription of Mendelssohn's 'On Wings of Song' (53874). Liebling's cantabile playing in this is particularly good.

There is a nameless something missing from Norah Drewett's playing of Debussy's 'La fille aux cheveux de lin' (51335). Perhaps she is a little too matter-of-fact, or, possibly, this particular piece loses by mechanical reproduction.

Seven Preludes of Liapounov make pleasant hearing. They are on two rolls—Nos. 1-4 on 53064*a* and Nos. 5-7 on 53064*b*. The playing, by Richard Rossler, is first-rate.

Marie Gabrielle Leschetizky gives a brilliant performance of Leschetizky's 'Barcarola,' Op. 39, No. 1; this would be worth a hearing for the execution alone (51528).

For those who like light music of the more popular kind there is Waldemar Sacks playing the 'Lied der Musette' from 'La Bohème.' This is Puccini with some slight decoration (59376).

The florid, scintillating type of waltz has dated considerably as salon music, but a good example of the type is Raff's transcription of Gounod's 'Valse de Juliette' (58295). Felix Wernow's playing is remarkably clear, and in the right glittering style.

Albert Grünfeld plays his own 'Causerie,' Op. 50, No. 4. Not remarkable for originality, and with rather too much repetition, it is still attractive, and the performance is good (51501).

ÆOLIAN

Audiographic.—The three children's rolls are delightful, especially that of Percy Grainger playing his 'Shepherds' Hey.' There are some amusing illustrations (Lendon) and running comments (Kirkham Jones) to this, which adults also will enjoy (D787, Pianola, D814).

The other two are Schumann's 'The Poor Orphan' and 'A Little Hunting Song' (D811, Pianola, D810), and 'The Merry Peasant' and 'Knight Rupert' (D809, Pianola, D810). These are all played by Harold Bauer with Introductions by Egerton Lowe, and they have all been cleverly fitted with little poems by Percy A. Scholes.

Chopin's Mazurka in C sharp minor has a first-rate performance by Leonid Kreutzer. The Introduction is by David Stanley Smith, and the running comments by the Æolian Editorial Staff—whose invention and imagination, by the way, must frequently inspire the player's sincere admiration (D829, Pianola, D830).

The other three rolls are all of the light but good type, and are as follows: Mendelssohn's 'Consolation' and 'Folk-Song' ('Songs Without Words,' Nos. 9 and 23), played by Beryl Rubinstein, with Introduction and running commentary by Winifred Harrison—the commentary on the 'Folk-Song' is a wee bit extravagant (D819, Pianola, D820); Rubinstein's 'Barcarolle,' in F minor, Op. 30, No. 1, played by Edwin Hughes, Mr. Scholes being responsible for the Introduction and running commentary (D813, Pianola, D814); Chaminade's 'Elevation,' played by the composer, Noel Gallon supplying the Introduction and the Æolian Editorial Staff the commentary (D805, Pianola, D806).

Duo-Art.—A good four-hand arrangement of 'Finlandia' is well served at the hands of Rudolph Ganz and Ernest Hutcheson (539), and our old friend the 'Zampa' Overture comes out surprisingly fresh, partly because of Ganz's firm rhythm and crisp playing (541).

Hinton's lively and attractive 'Rigaudon' is ably performed by Katharine Goodson (7245).

We do not look for much originality in such a work as Leybach's 'My Solitudes' (Nocturne No. 4), one solitude being much like another, but the roll is a good one, partly because it gives us another opportunity of hearing Geneviève Pitot's delightful playing (7230).

Hand-played.—Here is the second roll of Schumann's Symphonic Studies, and a very fine one it is. Percy Grainger's interpretation is admirable (A1149*f*). Another good Schumann roll is that of Friedmann's performance of 'Des Abends' and 'Warum?' The latter reproduces less well than 'Des Abends,' and calls for careful manipulation (A1147*e*).

'Guitare' is Chaminade at her best—and she can be interesting as well as attractive. This is well played by the composer (A1143).

Metrostyle.—There is nothing very exciting in this section, but all are pleasant and easily managed. They are 'The Gay Postillion,' by Bohm (T30421*a*), Rubinstein's 'Romance' in F (T30423A), and 'Intermezzo,' by Gilbert Lamb (T30424*a*).

Wireless Notes

By 'ARIEL'

My remarks about the Bach disarrangement for military band have evoked some correspondence, including a Letter to the Editor which will, no doubt, be found in its proper place. Mr. W. A. Chislett, of Barrow-in-Furness, in the course of an interesting note adds that there is 'a really magnificent' brass band arrangement of Bach's 'Great' G minor, by the late J. Weston Nicholl. I gather that it has never been published, and that the MS. is in the possession of Black Dyke Band. Mr. Chislett's mention of this arrangement reminds me that Mr. Nicholl wrote to me shortly after he had completed it, suggesting that I should keep a look-out for gramophone records thereof. None, however, came my way, so his version has apparently been neither recorded nor published. Is it too much to hope that this transcription may be made available? I feel confident that brass and/or military band arrangements of a few of the more animated and readily attractive of Bach's organ works would be popular with players, and would make many fresh Bachites among their enormous audience.

It seems to me that the question of suitable material for military band transcriptions deserves more careful consideration than it appears to have had so far. Not every piece of loud, quick orchestral music lends itself to the process; frequently the string writing is of a type that cannot be replaced effectively by the wood-wind. Keyboard works, too, are often badly treated. I once heard (not by wireless) an arrangement of Rachmaninov's C sharp minor Prelude in which the rapid triplet chords for alternate hands were given to different sections of the band, with ludicrous results, as they never quite fitted. An easy and effective keyboard passage thus became extremely difficult, if not impracticable.

A good example of choice and treatment was broadcast on April 15, when the Wireless Military Band played a Mozart Divertimento transcribed by Gerrard Williams, a musician who has just the right deft touch and good taste for this kind of work. I hope we shall hear more of his arrangements. The only adverse criticism I have to make in regard to the Divertimento was that Mr. Williams was too conscientious in giving us all Mozart's endless repetitions. We need not be too slavishly respectful of repeat marks nowadays. To a considerable extent they were conventional, and composers seem to have added the fatal two dots very often quite mechanically.

Now that I am dealing with the military band performances I go on to add a complaint concerning the playing. I am, I know, only one of many who feel that the standard of performance is less good than it was a year or so ago, and certainly far below what it ought to be. A good deal of the playing sounds quite casual. Opinions may differ concerning nuance and other interpretative points, but there can be no question concerning the desirability of perfect ensemble. If I remember right, some statistics published last year showed that military band programmes are among the most popular of the musical fare supplied by the B.B.C. Anything less than a good standard of performance must thus have an adverse effect on the taste of a big body of listeners. The band is good, and the conductor an expert, so probably it is merely a question of adequate rehearsal. If so, the natural solution is to give us fewer military band programmes, and see that they are better prepared.

The reference above to slavish respect for repeat marks in the older classics reminds me of a kindred point that might be considered. It was good to hear a week of Haydn's Pianoforte Sonatas in the 'Foundations of Music' series, but it must have occurred to many besides myself that in broadcasting works so very unequal in quality, better justice would be done to the composer, and more pleasure given to the hearer, if the Sonatas had been regarded less as wholes than as collections of movements. In some sonatas two of the movements are poor, and one delightful. In dealing with so many as thirty-four sonatas there can be no reasonable objection to giving us only the plums. This method might well be followed in regard to such similarly unequal works as the Mozart Pianoforte Sonatas and the Handel Suites.

Going back for a moment to that question of organ transmission, I have received an interesting letter from Mr. Hugh Gardner, of Harrow. He agrees that the fault lies less in transmission than in receiving sets. He himself uses a powerful set and a coil-driven speaker with plenty of force behind it, with the result that the pedal notes come through magnificently. 'The 32-ft. stop at Southwark Cathedral sometimes shakes the ornaments on the mantelpiece at the other end of a large music-room, and the echo of the building seems to be present without blurring the tone.' Mr. Gardner says that he gets better reception from the organ than from any other instrument. He adds that it is largely a matter of expense, as the current consumption is rather high.

Mr. Gardner also makes an interesting point concerning the broadcasting of Church choirs. He believes that the best of choirs develop certain habits owing to the peculiar acoustic properties of the buildings in which they sing, and that these perfectly reasonable methods are apt to sound like unpleasant mannerisms when reproduced in the studio. This is yet one more problem that choral singers have to face when broadcasting. It is also a serviceable reminder to listeners that they should not be in a hurry with adverse criticism.

Teachers' Department

'THAT SINKING FEELING!'

By HERVEY ELWES

Of all the bogies that beset young performers nervousness is the worst. A child may be perfectly capable of playing a certain piece on the pianoforte or the violin quite well enough to satisfy his teacher, and yet, should he learn that he is to perform that piece in public, he very possibly becomes a prey to an attack of nerves which will make him miserable during all the days that elapse before the dreaded date, and will so affect his physical and mental powers that his playing, when the time comes, will be of the feeblest description. All the participants in this tiresome little tragedy—child, teacher, and parents—will be more or less disappointed. The trouble, too, is cumulative; the fact of having failed once makes failure in the future almost inevitable.

The pity of it is that it is not children of the bold, unbiddable type who so frequently do themselves less than justice under the above circumstances, but more often boys and girls who are really keen on music, and who would quite enjoy playing to others if only they could do so without suffering so acutely from 'that sinking feeling!'

This being so, it is well worth the while of any teacher to do what is possible to help young performers to overcome their diffidence. Here a mother of the right sort may be of immense assistance. But the subject must be approached with great tact. You remember how, in Mrs. Ewing's delightful 'Jackanapes,' Tony Johnson's mother and Jackanapes' aunt both agreed that Tony was 'delicate.' With this difference: Mrs. Johnson meant that Tony was more finely-strung, more sensitive than Jackanapes. Whereas, when Miss Jessamine said that Tony was 'delicate,' she meant he was 'more puling, less manly, and less healthily brought-up' than her own nephew.

So, whatever your private opinion may be concerning the probable mistakes in the upbringing of your pupils, you must carefully hide your thoughts from their mothers. You must stress the point that the unsatisfactory performances of Michael or of Mary, at home or before a larger audience, is not due to the fact that the child in question is a half-wit or physically defective. On the contrary, it denotes a special sensitiveness which, though it may show itself in the form of nervous attacks to-day, will, under the guidance of a sympathetic teacher (yourself!), quite likely prove to be the foundation of an assured technique, and the power of regarding even the largest audience merely as rows of cabbages.

One way to help this happy prediction to come true is to persuade the mother of a nervous child on no account to use any kind of force in attempting to make the child 'show off' in public. A policy of 'masterly (or, rather, 'motherly') inactivity' will often bring about the desired result. Children are, of course, extraordinarily imitative. Take them to a cinema, and directly they return home they will attempt to emulate, in their own nursery, some of the feats they have witnessed on the screen. In the same way, if more or less perfunctory pianoforte-playing has been going on in a drawing-room midst the rattle of tea-cups and the buzz of conversation, you will notice, after a time, that a child who, earlier in the afternoon, may have resolutely refused a pressing invitation to perform, will sidle up to the pianoforte, obviously intent on making a little noise on his or her own account.

And when all 's said and done, that is the only way the art of music can really bring enjoyment to performers and to listeners. The wish to play must be strong enough to overcome the performer's doubts concerning his powers of execution. It is to make the child want to play which should be the aim of everyone interested in the progress of little musical pilgrims.

This should be your first thought when arranging a Pupils' Concert. See that everything is as informal as possible. It is better not to have a fixed programme. But if you like you can, of course, have a leaflet printed giving the names of your pupils and the titles of the pieces which each is supposed to be prepared to perform if required. This will leave you free to call upon your young students to render each item in the order in which, judging by their appearance at the moment, you think them most likely to do justice to themselves—and to you as their teacher. In selecting what they shall play, it is wise to choose something which is below their usual capabilities. From the point of view of the audience's enjoyment, and for your own sake, it is much better that a child should perform, cheerfully and fairly efficiently, whatever is the modern equivalent of 'The Maiden's Prayer' or Braga's Serenata, than that he or she should stumble through some piece that is a shade too difficult for small fingers numbed by the importance of the occasion.

All this is very elementary, but it is based on recollections of a childhood long past. And it is, perhaps, those of us who once suffered from nervousness, and remember how horrid it was, who are in the best position to realise how much physical and mental discomfort may be avoided by just a little thought and tact on the part of parents and teachers.

A MODERN APPROACH TO MUSIC-TEACHING:
IV.—THE MATERIAL OF MUSIC—THE POWER OF SOUND

By NORAH H. BORE

Listen to a Beethoven Symphony, and when it is finished stop for a moment and consider the limited material out of which this miracle of sound has been created. How many separate notes go to its fashioning? Twelve only. This is an amazing fact if we consider the range of emotional expression of which they are capable. What is the explanation which makes so limited a means so powerful an agent? There are three important reasons contributing to this fact:

1. The emotional power of sound.
2. The fundamental nature of rhythm and its power to stimulate us physically.
3. The intellectual satisfaction which we feel in the apprehension of relationship.

It is important to realise that sound is a powerful emotional force. Everyday experience constantly acknowledges this fact. Is it not true that we recognise the real attitude of a speaker not by what he says but by how he says it? Mr. St. John Ervine, in the Observer of Sunday, April 22,

1928, advised us to go to see the actors of the Moscow Art Theatre at the Garrick Theatre. He said, 'Even if they [the spectators] be Russian-less, as I am . . . it [Ostrovsky's play, 'Poverty is No Crime'] will provide them with constant laughter.' Yet how can an unknown language convey anything to us unless by varieties of intonation and expression—in other words, by variants in the pitch relations. The English language is full of phrases which indicate this power of expressing emotions by means of sound. Do we not speak of a 'cry of pain,' 'a shriek of agony,' 'mocking laughter,' 'envious tones,' 'furious words'? But are words furious? Can tones be envious? The written word can never convey agony or pain. Hence we must refer in speaking thus to a certain emotional tone or colour in which the words were uttered. Dr. Buck expresses it thus: 'Accents and qualities of language are in origin expressions of mental and emotional stresses to which the common experience of men has given a common value. . . . They are the articulate but fluid representations of experience.' *

If you want to test the facts for yourself, use the vowel sounds which serve as ejaculations—'Ah! Oh! Ugh!'—and express with them as many shades of emotion as possible. Listen to the range of sound which distinguishes each. 'Ah!' an exclamation of satisfaction, is a rich, low tone; 'Ah!' a cry of pain, is high-toned and shrill; 'Ah!' indicating dawning knowledge, passes through a succession of tones, ranging from higher to lower. This is so obvious that it needs no further elaboration. It must, however, be remembered that the tonal range of speech is more restricted than that of music; we see in it only the beginnings of what in music has become an instrument of infinitely extended emotional range.

Two interesting questions suggest themselves to us at this point. First, how did any particular tonal arrangements originally become associated with the emotion it now expresses? It obviously belongs to the very earliest experiences of the human race, since it is now an intuitive possession of every baby. The child certainly never learns by imitation how to produce the scream-because-I-am-angry or the scream-because-I-am-in-pain. Secondly, how much have these primitive emotional symbols helped to shape the melodic outlines of our music of to-day? The certainty and assurance of a tonic harmony share much of the nature of an affirmation in ordinary speech; a rising scale-passage of that of an interrogation or uncertainty. These are both definite emotional states. Can we press the matter further? Tests have been undertaken in America to discover whether an average audience reacts emotionally in the same way to music. On the findings of this particular set of experiments such common emotional reactions as 'joy,' 'rest,' 'sadness,' were recorded by a large percentage of the subjects.† Tests such as these, however, can at best only deal with very obvious reactions. This invalidates their findings to some extent, for emotion is a fluid state and is in constant flux and reflux; the emotional outline of a composition is as varied and subtle as its rhythmic and tonal outlines.

Mr. Ernest Newman has attacked the subject in a much more musicianly fashion in his book 'The Unconscious Beethoven.' Here he tries to analyse the characteristic motifs to be found in the writings of composers, and to associate these with their emotional content. 'It is astonishing,' he says, speaking of Beethoven, 'to what a small number of formulæ—melodic, rhythmic, and so on—his apparently so varied procedure can be reduced.' He finds, for instance, that Beethoven uses a rising figure of three notes in various guises whenever he is stirred by deep emotional feeling. The examples cited in proof of this statement are numerous and convincing, and whether we agree or disagree with Mr. Newman's main thesis, the book is stimulating from this point of view. We hope that the promise of further work along these lines will be fufilled.

It seems to me that this form of research on emotional reactions to music is more profitable than experiments on isolated sounds, for the obvious reason that isolated notes are in themselves merely musical sounds (as opposed to unmusical sound), and not melody. Sounds or notes are to melody as pulses are to rhythm. The first in each case is the inert material into which the vivifying life of music can be fused. This vivifying power is movement or progression, whether rhythmic or tonal; rhythm is a progression through pulses; melody a progression through tones. Miss M. Glyn admirably realises the inter-relation of these two movements when she coins the somewhat clumsy term 'rhythmitonal movement.' *

It is true that certain notes have distinctive characters, but it is important to remember that musically this character is modified and determined by its relation with other tones. In Aural Culture work we train children to recognise individual notes, but this is done by establishing a tacit relationship between each of these and the tonic note.

The physical stimulus of rhythm and the power of self-expansion which it produces in hearer and performer is the second factor which makes sound so powerful emotionally. Rhythm in its simplest form is a physical stimulus which produces a sense of power—which urges to action. It is, therefore, an expansive influence, and by this fact makes us emotionally receptive. The particular quality which emerges from the union of rhythmic and tonal movement can, for want of a better term, be called the dramatic quality of music.

Drama is action, movement towards some point; if movement is to be meaningful it must have a goal. When we speak of the dramatic moment in a play we mean the moment of climax—the culminative moment towards which the whole movement has been directed—that which gives purpose and meaning to the whole. So in music: rhythmic and tonal movement converge towards given points where they become momentarily locked, and emotional effect is produced by tension and relaxation up to and away from such points of climax. Again, these series of climaxes have among them one which is the culminating moment of the whole. Dr. George Dyson in a provocative and stimulating chapter on 'Rhythm and Melody' in his book 'The New Music,' refers to this element of music as 'rhapsodic movement.' † He cites the opening phrase of 'L'Après-Midi d'un Faune' (Debussy) as a good example of such writing.

* 'The Scope of Music.'

* 'The Rhythmic Conception of Music.'
† Dr. Dyson uses the term 'rhythm' in a misleading sense. He distinguishes rhythm and rhapsody where we are accustomed to find metre and rhythm.

This term brings out extremely well the inherent quality of all great melody, which is in origin song, but, in my opinion, it ignores the debt which melody must always pay to rhythm. Bach is supremely great in such expression. The Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue is an example of this mastery in its freest form. The inevitable urge onwards, the fitness of the melodic curves, and the greatness of the dramatic conception are what give the quality of supreme 'rightness' to his work.

The recognition of this dramatic quality in music implies the third and last element which gives sound its power.

We have referred to the physical and emotional aspects of music in rhythm and tone—we have so far ignored the intellectual. If music is capable of affording the greatest æsthetic satisfaction, it must have inherent in it material which will satisfy the whole of our nature. The highest æsthetic experience unites in one supreme expression the fused capacity of the whole of our faculties. Such a fusion can probably only be maintained for short spaces of time, but it is as the fusion slackens that the completeness of the experience weakens.

What, then, is the intellectual side of our æsthetic experience? It is the recognition and establishment in our minds of relationship between the units which make music. By the establishment of relationship between varying pitches, melody is created. Melody is this motion from tone to tone. Mr. Calvocoressi says: 'The æsthetic value of form resides solely in the reciprocal relationship of parts within a whole.' * This sentence emphasises the final purpose of this intellectual process. It is the eternal search for truth; the desire for complete knowledge which urges us to persevere in the complicated process by which we mentally piece units of sound into an intelligible whole. We are spurred on by the revelatory power of the final synthesis.

Can this analysis be reconciled with such a statement as the following of Mr. Edwin Evans? I think it can. 'I have long been convinced,' says Mr. Evans, 'that the only tenable definition of melody is a succession of single notes so arranged that their mutual relations are those to which the ear is accustomed—in short, that melody is chiefly our recognition of the familiar. I would go so far as to say that there is no such thing as melody in the abstract; it is the creation, not of sound, but of habit. I am convinced that that melody will gain the largest number of adherents which imposes upon the listener of whatever standard the least effort in the direction of acquiring a new habit.' †

At the risk of being accused of over-quoting, I should like to put the following statement by Dr. Dyson beside that of Mr. Evans: 'Every interval, every turn of phrase, either invokes or fails to invoke conscious or unconscious memories, and it is these memories which give the present sensation such completeness of satisfaction or wealth of experience as it may have.'

I have quoted these writers for, by insisting on the power of associative musical memory, they seem to me to approach the problem from the right angle. The effect of music upon us is after all a psychological problem, and it is as such that we must approach it. The stress which Mr. Evans and Dr. Dyson lay upon our habitual reactions to sound, and to the long-stored-up associated memory upon which we draw from our racial experience, does not necessarily preclude an intellectual approach to music. It does, however, show the limits beyond which the intellect cannot function. Granted that our capacity to apprehend melody lies in an accumulated racial experience, the distinction between a great and a mediocre melody lies nevertheless in its capacity to stir us imaginatively. Dr. Dyson expresses this idea in speaking of Bach. 'Bach did not invent his phrases. Everyone of them had in detail been used hundreds of times before. It was the imaginative relations in which he placed them which made them seem new.' It is in this order of perception that we exercise our minds musically. It is by this means that experience is enriched. The artist by his birthright of imagination has a knowledge denied his fellows, which, if he would preserve, he must exercise.

'Children's Percussion Bands.' By L. de Russette. [Kegan Paul and Curwen, 3*s.* 6*d.*]

Nowadays we do not teach children anything; we provide opportunities for them to teach themselves. In 'Children's Percussion Bands' Miss L. de Rusette provides opportunities for the little ones to equip themselves with most of the elements of a musical education from the ages of four to eight.

She divides her scheme into three stages. In Stage I. (four-year olds) the children gain an aural perception of pulse and rhythmic pattern by beating instruments (chiefly drums and bells) and beating time, at the dictates of their own sweet wills, for there is no formal instruction in these years: understanding is only instinctive.

With Stage II. come the beginnings of intellectual understanding. The band now consists of drums, tambourines, triangles, and one pair of cymbals for an honoured soloist! More formal conducting is also undertaken, and the interpretation of the music and the choice of instrumentation is placed in the conductor's hands. Rhythmic patterns are now not only heard and tapped, but written in a picture notation of shorts and longs.

With Stage III. come the introduction of part-playing and of musical notation. Hitherto songs (largely Nursery Rhymes) have been the basis of the band. Now the pianoforte takes the place of the voice. The writing of musical notation is begun—and compound time introduced in a manner that is hardly accurate:

> 'The class is told that quite often three running sounds fit into a single sound of longer duration. . . . When three notes fit into one note, the one note lasts a little longer and has a dot printed after it.'

This is not a very satisfactory explanation, and though the time-name, ta-té-ti, is given, neither its meaning nor that of the dot is explained.

There are a number of small vaguenesses of this sort, which are, however, only slight blemishes on an otherwise helpful and suggestive little work for teachers of young children.

A particularly interesting section is devoted to the use of the band with feeble-minded children. The book closes with a useful list of music recommended for percussion-band work.

E. M. G. R.

A new Instruction Book, 'Let 's play and sing around the clock,' by Gladys Willan and Olive Brush, with illustrations by Georgette Berckmans, comes from the Frederick Harris Co. It provides a systematic course for teaching the pianoforte and ear-training to beginners, in class and individual lessons, based on nursery rhymes selected to suit the compass of children's voices, and arranged in all the major keys. It is an attempt 'to place before teachers and pupils alike a fundamental plan of ear-training which will enable the pupil to hear, sing, play, and write in all the major keys in their due order.' A similar book dealing with the minor keys is in course of preparation. All the nursery rhymes are in the form of duets, with the pupil's part in single notes divided between the two hands, and always within the compass of five notes.

G. G.

Teachers of beginners will find Donald Gray's 'Beginnings'—very first lessons in the rudiments of music—just the book for the early stages of what many young people are apt to regard as a rather dull subject. The pupil is led by easy steps from the writing of clefs to the barring of simple passages. Numerous blank staves are provided for additional exercises (Boosey, 1*s*.).

Marion R. Anderson's 'Harmony Games' for children is written with the object of bringing 'the play spirit into the teaching of very elementary harmony.' Those interested must be referred to the book itself, which is published by Cramer (2*s*. 6*d*.). We are told that the musical exercises and suggested games are the direct outcome of experience with a class of children averaging eight to nine years of age; 'so quickly did they respond that the idea developed and has proved to be a practical way of leading the children naturally and spontaneously along the Harmony Road.'

POINTS FROM LECTURES

Lecturing at Heaton Chapel, Mr. Rutland Boughton traced the rise of art in Christian civilization. The principle of Gothic art he found in the music of Bach—the sense of the association of the divine and human spirits, and at the same time no single part of the music of Bach was autocratic or stood out on its own. He said that a good piece of music might be recognised from a bad one if one part was important and the other was doing only dull work. In such case the piece was inferior. But where both parts were equally important, then it was a really good piece. Mr. Boughton's main topic was Schubert, the song writer. Schubert, by bringing back the common music of the people into one of the most definite forms of art, made a mark which no other composer since had been able to do. 'Don't be ashamed to like vulgar things,' said Mr. Boughton. 'Don't be ashamed to dislike Bach, but try to like him. Let us be honest in our tastes; we shall thus necessitate composers writing for us. What Schubert did then has got to be done again to-day, if the great world of music is to become and remain a great thing instead of being the private province of a few unhappy musicians.'

At Ferndale, when lecturing on Handel, Sir Walford Davies said, 'It is a great pity that the Board of Education has not yet realised that music is a natural language and seen to it that every child in Wales had a little musical bible with a couple of hundred splendid little melodies. In fifteen years' time we would then have our children and young people pouring out simple melodies by the thousand, and able to read both notations as easily as the Bible or the newspaper. We want the freedom of the City of Music in our schools, so that the children can sing their own melodies, and read the melodies of the world at sight. That happy time is coming.'

'Music in England To-day' was Mr. H. C. Colles's subject at Leighton House, Kensington. He said that in England, unlike other countries, music was performed by a large number of amateurs as well as professionals, and that we did not have State-aided orchestras as, for instance, were found in Germany and Italy. He went on to say that music in England always had been haphazard, was haphazard now, and he would not say always would be, but would be, he thought, for some time to come.

Speaking at Liverpool, on the application of broadcasting in the teaching of music, Mr. C. V. Hely-Hutchinson said that in actual teaching a great deal depended on the personal touch or contact between the teacher and the pupil. What the wireless music teacher could do, however, was to emphasise the general principle on which the pupil could proceed. Wireless could do a great deal towards a widespread musical appreciation.

'Humour in the life of an opera singer,' the title of a lecture announced at Birkenhead, afforded Mr. Robert Parker an opportunity of relating his experiences. If there was no humour in their lives he thought opera-singers would all go mad. Opera was really one of the most ridiculous things on the face of the earth. In 'Il Trovatore' the villain sang, 'She shall be mine,' the chorus sang, 'She shall be thine'; and that continued for some minutes. Practically every member of the British National Opera Company, continued Mr. Parker, was losing money in order to keep the show alive. The sum he received for singing on the previous night was about one-sixth of what he received for a single performance before the war. Describing some unrehearsed incidents in performances, Mr. Parker recalled one theatre in which a sort of miniature Blackpool big wheel was used for the scene where Wagner's Rhinemaidens went swimming. The maidens were strapped to the wheel, and it was revolved to create the proper effect. Unfortunately, one night the apparatus stuck fast, and left a very distinguished singer hanging upside down thirty feet above the stage. The lady lost her temper. 'Ach! let me down!' she screamed. 'What kind of a position in this for the mother of twelve children!'

Irish music collections were described in a lecture by Dr. Annie Patterson, at Cork. More than ninety of these collections were named in Grattan Flood's 'History of Irish Music,' 1887. Since that date at least a dozen later series of Irish music collections had appeared, all more or less consisting of Irish melodic items; thus the total was over a hundred. There was, of necessity, a good deal of re-duplication of items printed over a publication period of two hundred years.

Answers to Correspondents

Questions must be of general musical interest. They must be stated simply and briefly, and if several are sent, each must be written on a separate slip. Our 'Answers to Correspondents' Column closes on the 14th of the month. We cannot undertake to reply by post.

TROMBONI.—(1.) Presumably the initials M.R.C.M. stand for 'Member of the Royal College of Music'—a label that is discountenanced by the College. We are sending the cutting to the College Registrar. (2.) We see no reason why the advertisement of shares in a college should not be advertised in our columns. The advertisement was not 'a slip,' as you suggest; nor are we 'opposed to money-making concerns,' provided the money is not made by fraud. Nearly all the activities in the musical world have to be 'money-making concerns,' otherwise they would soon put up the shutters. Be reasonable!

NOVICE.—(1.) In very long phrases it is advisable to arrange for the choir to breathe in sections. But your plan (front breathing at one point, back row at another) is open to the objection that the process may be apparent to the listener. A better way is for the relaying to be done by alternate singers. (2.) We do not think an adjudicator would penalise a choir if, in a passage for sopranos alone, the contraltos, or a few of them, lent a hand. It is generally understood that in all such bits one part may be eked out by another. Often, in fact, the step is necessary in small choirs. Not the least important part of a conductor's job is the making of such adjustments. The result is the main thing, and if commonsense or necessity calls for such departures from the printed copy, don't be afraid of making them. (3.) Phrasing is not an exact science. As you say, 'one feels in one's bones what the phrasing ought to be'; but we don't agree that 'the bones are often wrong.' The 'bones' are the natural instinct—a pretty sure guide in a musical person. But thought is needed as well; let instinct be your first guide, thought your second and third. The suggested phrasing you give for the Walford Davies song is good, with a break after 'Rest,' but not after 'cries' if your singers can do without it. You ask if the words should always give way to the music. The answer is 'No,' but rather the other way round. A practical composer, however, usually sets his text in such a way that words and music work together in amity, and there 's no question of 'giving way.' (4.) The madrigal you inquire about is Orlando Gibbons's 'What is our life?' It is for five voices, and is a splendid example. It is very difficult. (5.) Programme music is music which depends largely for its effect on association with a story or person, or some aspect of Nature. Beethoven's 'Pastoral' Symphony is programme music; so, in a lesser degree, is the 'Eroica.' His other symphonies (except for the choral part of the ninth) are 'abstract' or 'pure' music. The best programme music depends very little on its programme in the long run. Thus, e.g., the 'Eroica' would probably have become as popular if it had been called merely Symphony No. 3, in E flat. On the other hand, much of the 'Pastoral' is of little account when listened to without reference to its title.

ORGANIST.—Most text-books on organ-playing give hints on registration. The only book devoted to the subject, so far as we know, is Everett E. Truette's 'Organ Registration' (Thompson & Co., Boston, $2.50). It goes into the subject very thoroughly, but is interesting rather than practical, because the numerous schemes suggested are useless save on organs of the size and type mentioned by the author. Organ registration is analogous to orchestration, but only up to a point. There is a vital difference from the student's point of view. Orchestration can be studied in a book, because all the instruments are standardised, whereas no two organs are alike, and even stops of the same name differ greatly in power and quality. Moreover, if organs and stops were standardised, the acoustic properties of churches and the disposition of the organ pipes (so that powerful stops sometimes sound quite tame and soft ones mezzo-forte) make it impossible for the player to depend on paper schemes. All he can do is to master general principles, and apply them with taste and discretion. He should also enlist the aid of another organist, in order to experiment both as player and listener. (2.) Several publishers have a music-lending library, but the facilities do not include musical text-books, so far as we know.

I. G.—You ask for a course of reading on the history of music, 'difficult books included.' Try any or all of the following: 'History of Music,' Stanford and Forsyth (Macmillan); 'History of English Music,' Henry Davey (Curwen); 'The Growth of Music,' H. C. Colles (Oxford University Press); 'History of Music in England,' Ernest Walker (Oxford University Press); 'A History of Music,' Cecil Gray (Kegan Paul); 'Summary of Musical History,' Parry (Novello); and P. C. Buck's little book in Benn's Sixpenny Series. We do not know what libraries stock any of the above.

R. G. R.—In Beethoven's Sonata in D, Op. 10, No. 3, the phrase:

Ex. 1.  &c.

should be played:

Ex. 2.  &c.

Beethoven was in the habit of writing appoggiaturas without crossing the quaver.

L. M.—We suggest that you give the spare copies of text-books to the nearest public library, or to the hon. secretary of your local Organists' Association for the use of members. The R.C.O. examination papers and calendars are sent by the College to all members, among whom would be prospective examinees, so we don't think your spare copies are likely to be needed. But if this meets the eye of a student who would like to have your back numbers of the Calendar, let him write to us, and we will forward the letter to you. (First come, first served.)

H. H.—We have no copy of the piece at hand, so we prefer not to commit ourselves to a metronome mark. From our recollection of the piece, however, we should say that an easy-going moderato meets the case. This is vague, of course, but it is actually better than a figure given by a mechanical contrivance. As we constantly say in regard to this type of question: if the pace and style of a piece are not apparent to a player after due study and thought, he is beyond the help of a metronome.

E. B. B.—A good many of Haydn's String Quartets are published separately in miniature score form. Write to Novello's for a list. (2.) Weber's 'Invitation to the Waltz' was originally written for pianoforte solo. Various orchestral arrangements have been made, the best-known to-day being probably that by Weingartner.

S. J. F.—We cannot say it is wrong to make a rallentando at the entry of the second subject in the Finale of the Beethoven's C sharp minor Sonata. Although no slowing-up is marked, a slight holding back seems reasonable. But it certainly should not be so very pronounced as you say.

E. C. T.—We have no copy of the song at hand, so cannot suggest a metronome mark. But why do you need such help? Study the song thoroughly, and the pace will reveal itself, and the 'pitfalls' you mention will disappear. If your study leads to no such result, a metronome won't make things right.

NEDW.—(1.) You ask us to tell you 'the best practical books for child beginners,' but you don't say what instrument is in store for the child. (2.) Write to the Secretary, Teachers' Registration Council, 47, Bedford Square, W.C.1.

G. M. M.—A series of unaccompanied solo songs appeared a few years ago, published by Messrs. Goodwin & Tabb. They were none of them 'sacred' in the ordinary sense of the term.

A. C. L.—We cannot trace or verify the Schubert quotation: 'It is only by a right sense of proportion that anything can achieve perfection.' Perhaps some Schubertian can help.

H. S.—The song, 'Robin m'aime, Robin m'a,' is included in a volume entitled 'Échos du temps passé,' edited by Wekerlin. It may be had from Novello (7*s.*).

L. P.—Messrs. Senart, 20, Rue de Dragon, Paris, VI[e].

G. H. C. asks if there is a reliable description of the mechanical organ for which Mozart wrote his two Fantasias in F. As we know of others who are interested in this question (we ourselves are among them), we should be glad if a reader can send some information.

In our reply to 'H. A. K.' in March we said that Chassins's 'Rush Hour in Hong Kong' and 'Flirtations in a Chinese Garden' are published by Augener. This was a slip. The publishers are Fischer Brothers, New York, and the sole London agents are Messrs. Chester.

GENEVA FESTIVAL

In his introduction to the programme of the seventh (Geneva) Festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music, Prof. Edward J. Dent recalls that the composers represented at the first (Salzburg) Festival were either practically unknown to the public or, if known, regarded as revolutionaries bent upon the destruction of musical art. To-day he describes Ravel, Stravinsky, and Schönberg as admitted to the ranks of classics, and therefore beyond the scope of these Festivals except for an occasional tribute of respect and admiration. At their sides he sees a phalanx of young composers whose names are made and who will in turn make way for composers unknown to-day. He is writing in his international rôle of President of the Society, and as preface to a set of programmes containing fifteen new names out of twenty-one, his remarks are apposite. They scarcely describe the status of those composers in England, where even now there is a tendency to regard the music performed at these Festivals as something remote and exotic —like Patagonian folk-lore, unrelated to musical progress. Whatever grounds may be urged for regarding these events as occurring on the periphery of the musical world, that attitude furnishes some excuse for the prevalent Continental view which places us on that periphery. The appreciation of the present position expressed by Prof. Dent is worthy of attention.

The circumstance that the two British contributors were included among the six whose names were not new to these Festivals affords some justification for dealing first with these. Vaughan Williams's 'Flos Campi' had a reception not unlike those it has had at home—that is to say, the minority which enjoyed it to the end did so in no half-hearted spirit, but gave vent to enthusiasm; for the majority such sustained, uneventful loveliness proved altogether too sedative. It was so completely different from anything else performed at the Festival, an oasis of restfulness amid alarums and excursions. But not everyone was temperamentally capable of profiting by it. The performance was a good one. Possibly the pace was a shade slow, and the intonation of the chorus tended more towards melancholy than was intended. Raymond Jeremy played the viola solo admirably, and the orchestra, under Ansermet, was splendid. John Ireland played his own Sonatina and did it less than justice, with the result that the audience failed to relish its close-knit character and the crispness of its gait.

Janácek's Festival Mass, no doubt chosen as a posthumous expression of the high esteem and deep affection in which he was held, stood in no need of such justification, as it was certainly one of the most successful works performed. He regards the Mass not from a liturgical standpoint, but as a popular manifestation in which each incident is an event rather than a rite. There is a constant suggestion that it is taking place in the open air. The exultation of the chorus is in keeping with it. Much of the writing is exclamatory. There are four solo voices, but they are not used as a quartet—which proved fortunate, since one of them, the tenor, failed at the last moment, and the soprano sang both parts. As in so much of Janácek's music, there is no thematic development in the usual sense, such as might have introduced an element of sophistication. This obviously contributed to the spontaneous effect of the Mass. It is music of the kind that looks, on paper, much less interesting than it can be made to sound in performance, and these Moravian soloists and choristers who had come from Brno to do honour to their fellow-citizen, certainly made the most of it under their conductor, Prof. Yaroslav Kvapil.

Another remarkable work by a composer who was no stranger to his audience was Max Butting's third Symphony. When it was first performed at Berlin, under Erich Kleiber, a few weeks ago, it met with rather a cool reception, but some who heard it on both occasions were loud in their praise of Scherchen, who conducted it at Geneva. Without subscribing to any current creed in its extreme form it is very typical of modern Germany in its austere construction, and its avoidance of the emotional appeal of inflection in favour of that which directly combines dynamic effect with intellectual method. The texture is free in the sense that diatonic progressions are not avoided, as they are by the professed atonalists. Cadences, of course, are another matter, but even sequences occur frequently. The interest is mainly contrapuntal, but the sheer tension of that interest translates itself into emotion. The movements are badly proportioned, the Largo being too long, the final Allegro too short. Undoubtedly it made a very favourable impression.

The two other works by these 'old stagers' were a Violin Sonata by Erwin Schulhoff—brilliant to a point where it savoured a little of showmanship, normal as to method, rather over-elaborate in the pianoforte part, a good work to conclude a sonata recital—and a Serenade-Trio by Jemnitz, the Hungarian. Like his other works, this fails to satisfy one that its allegiance to current idioms is a matter of faith with the composer. His ideas seem to antedate his manner of expressing them.

Let us now turn to the new-comers. Three of them are not to be reckoned among the youngsters —for the Continent has not copied our amiable habit of calling a man a 'young British composer' until he begins to grow old. These were Maurice Delage, a pupil of Ravel, faithful to the earlier style of his master, whose 'Sept Haï-Kaïs' for voice and chamber orchestra, sung by Madame Madeleine Grey, were one of the successes of the Festival, both because of their charming quality and because of the contrast they created in a somewhat strenuous programme; Frank Martin, an assistant at the Jaques-Dalcroze Institute, whose contribution appropriately consisted of three orchestral studies in combined rhythms, ingeniously contrived and agreeable to hear; and Krsto Odak, the Yugo-Slav composer of a five-part madrigal—buoyant, not very pretentious music, though it concluded with a well-wrought fugue.

These leave us with twelve composers representing the newest generation, their ages ranging from twenty-three (Johannes Müller, Dresden) to thirty-four (Henriette Bosmans). Let us group them by countries. The Germans, with whom we may conveniently include the German-Czech Viktor Ullmann, numbered five. Two of them had adopted the Schönbergian technique, in which Julius Schloss gave us a midnight-oilish quartet in one slow movement which was almost doomed to fail because of the curiously unattractive twelve-note pattern he had selected as its foundation, and Viktor Ullmann, who gave us Five Variations and Double Fugue on a small pianoforte piece by Schönberg which Prof. Franz Langer interpreted with so much spirit that even those who confessed that Schönberg was a sealed book to them were impressed. Both the piece which served as theme and the Variations reared upon it are ejaculatory, semi-pugnacious music, and it was exhilarating to see the pianist, pausing on a note of exclamation, gaze at the pianoforte as if expecting it to retort with something equally pungent. But joking apart, there was something compelling about it, and many made a note to take an early opportunity to study the work. The other three Germans may be dismissed briefly: Karl Marx, a Munich composer, whose Motet 'Werkleute sind wir' (Rilke) was sung by a madrigal society from Stuttgart, may be regarded as representing a kind of neo-academicism, proficient, well-grounded, full of technical interest, but not very inspiring; Berthold Goldschmidt, of Hamburg, a Schreker pupil with a Pianoforte Sonata, the two Allegros of which are couched in the hard, toccata-like style of the day and would sound quite as well on the pianola as at the hands of any pianist, hectic music surrounding a more thoughtful slow movement; and Johannes Müller-Dresden, the Benjamin of them all, with a concerto in which there was undeveloped talent, and, rara avis in these surroundings, actually a repeat! Franz Osborn played these last two works, a pianist very typical of the new tendency, efficient to a fault, if that is possible, dazzling in his technique, but strangely aloof from the very suggestion of sentiment. We shall hear him in London some day.

Two Dutch ladies, Henriette Bosmans with a Concertino for pianoforte and orchestra in which she was the soloist, and Emmy Heil-Frensel-Wegener with a Dance for clarinet and orchestra, must, however reluctantly, be placed somewhere near the bottom of the class. The former translated Ravel into terms of drawing-room music, and the latter disported herself with agility among rhythmic patterns of little serious worth, doing badly what Frank Martin had done rather well.

The young Frenchmen were welcome, both on their merits and because they contributed a divergent element to the Festival. Marcel Delannoy's 'Le Fou de la Dame' is a chanson de geste, acted by a set of chessmen, and presenting a sort of nursery tale with a heroic flavour. It is to be produced at the Opéra-Comique. The music is in keeping, light, occasionally irreverent, witty, cleverly scored, with a buoyant kind of polyphony which titillates the palate. Those who like to hear their music with a furrowed brow may reject it on the ground that it is slight, but the majority found it very delectable. Manuel Rosenthal's Sonatine for two violins and pianofortes is an example, more skilful than usual, of the lately fashionable blend of innocent diatonic tunes seasoned and spiced with a counterpoint which hovers midway between Auric and Honegger. It is pleasant enough, because it happens to be well done, but it would probably wear badly. From Paris come two other composers, a Pole and a Russian. The former, Jerzy Fitelberg, contributed a String Quartet in one wildly excited movement, which was generally admired despite the rather exaggerated whirl it set up. It is his second work in this form. If the third shows a little more restraint it may well be a very fine thing. The Russian, Nicholas Nabokoff, sent a cycle of 'Songs to the Virgin Mary,' rather suggestive of the cultured amateur in their scorn of the musical amenities, the vocal part very trying, the pianoforte accompaniment clumsy and heavy-footed.

There remains the American, Roger Sessions, whose Symphony in E minor opened the Festival. This was first performed in 1927 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Kussewitzky, and attracted much attention in the States. The composer, now thirty-two, was recently a pupil of Ernest Bloch, whose influence is recognisable here and there, together with that of Stravinsky. But in the main, so far as a European can judge, this is American music. The slow movement, which is admirably scored, has a touch of sentiment such as could scarcely emanate from these effete nations and decadent cultures, and if the rhythmic jangle of the opening toccata suggests analogous utterances in Europe, we cannot overlook that these in turn owe something to jazz. The Finale, with its lively references to some ill-defined folk-lore, is most clearly of European derivation, but even there one feels other forces at work. In the scoring the strings play a secondary part, presumably in deference to the general mistrust created among the 'moderns' by their tendency to weep on slight provocation. The wood-wind is particularly effective. The Symphony is scarcely great music, but intensely interesting compared with all that the International has hitherto received from the New World. Somebody was even overheard referring to it as 'The Birth of a Nation.'

The standard of performance has been remarkably high. The Orchestre de la Suisse Romande is prepared to die in the last ditch for its beloved creator, Ernest Ansermet, who had the privilege of passing on to Hermann Scherchen an admirable vehicle for his Butting Symphony. The Prolute Quartet bore the heat and burden of the day—two days—in the chamber music, and showed that there had been no shirking of preliminary study. They played Schloss, Jemnitz, Fitelberg, with the insight and careful precision which we English reserve for the dead. Richard Zika, leader of the quartet which bears his name, saw to it that Schulhoff was well interpreted. I have already mentioned two pianists and a singer. The rest were as good, if less conspicuous.

Next year's Festival, the eighth, is to take place early in September, at Liége, in close association with the annual Congress of Musicology. The jury was elected at Geneva, and consists of Max Butting (Germany), Jacques Ibert (France), G. F. Malipiero (Italy), Paul A. Pisk (Austria), and Erwin Schulhoff (Czecho-Slovakia). There is a second panel of five available in case any of these should be unable to attend the meeting, which, as usual, will be held in Switzerland.

The British delegate was the bearer of an invitation to hold the ninth (1931) Festival at Oxford, during the last fortnight of July. After a friendly discussion of alternative offers, this was accepted. It is to be hoped that British music-lovers will rally in sufficient numbers to make that Festival as big a success as its predecessors.

UNION OF GRADUATES IN MUSIC, INCORPORATED

The thirty-sixth annual general meeting of the Union of Graduates in Music took place at the Hotel Great Central, Marylebone, on March 21, the President, Dr. C. H. Kitson, Professor of Music in the University of Dublin and Dean of the Faculty of Music in the University of London, being in the chair. There was a large and representative attendance of members. Dr. Granville Bantock, Professor of Music in the University of Birmingham, was unanimously elected President of the Union for the ensuing year. There were eight nominations for the seven vacancies on the Council. The votin of the members present resulted in the election of the Rev. Dr. E. H. Fellowes, Lieut. H. E. Adkins, Dr. G. F. Brockless, Dr. B. Lofthouse, Dr. R. Walker Robson, Mr. Charles F. Bowes, and Mr. A. Forbes Milne. Twenty graduates in music had been admitted to membership during the past year. The request of the Council of the Incorporated Society of Musicians for a member of the Council of the Union to be elected to serve on the Council of that body for a period of three years as from January, 1929, was referred back to the Council of the Union for final decision.

The meeting was followed by the annual dinner. The various toasts were proposed by the Chairman (Dr. Kitson), Dr. C. Hazlehurst, Mr. Ronald Chamberlain, Dr. G. F. Brockless, and Lieut. H. E. Adkins, and responded to by Mr. J. Raymond Tobin, Sir Henry Wood, Capt. A. R. Newling, and Mr. Stanley D. B. James.

Among other members and guests present were Sir Wilfred Collet, the Rev. Canon T. H. Ross, the Rev. Dr. W. J. Foxell, the Rev. Norman C. Woods, Major and Mrs. J. C. J. Hoby, Dr. R. H. Hunt, Dr. C. H. Merrill, Dr. T. G. O'Feely, Dr. P. G. Saunders, Mr. J. D. Beebee, Mrs. G. F. Brockless, Mr. G. R. H. Clark, Mr. N. P. Clark, Mr. S. R. Collet, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Comley, Mr. and Mrs. D. Douglas, Mr. W. G. W. Goodworth, Mr. A. P. Howe, Miss Margaret Jones, Mrs. C. H. Kitson, Mr. M. C. W. Long, Mr. and Mrs. W. Lovelock, Mr. Philip Miles, Mr. C. N. H. Rodwell, Mr. H. Wardale, Mrs. J. Warriner, and the hon. treasurer and secretary, Mr. Charles Long.

The seventh annual dinner of the Musicians' Benevolent Fund will take place at the Savoy Hotel on May 7, at 7 p.m. Countess Russell (author of 'Elizabeth and her German Garden') will be in the chair, and among the speakers will be Sir Walford Davies, Mrs. Robert Henderson, and Mr. Plunket Greene. The English Singers will provide the music, and Miss Sara Allgood will also contribute to the programme. A novel feature will be the replacement of the toast-master by a group of trumpeters from Kneller Hall, who will herald each toast by a fanfare from a set written by various modern composers. Tickets, one guinea, from the Offices of the Fund, 16, John Street, Bedford Row, W.C.1.

We have received a copy of 'The Advance Date Book,' compiled specially for the use of lecturers, musicians, secretaries, hall managers, and all others who have to make arrangements for dates a long way ahead. It contains a space for every day from July 1 of this year up to June 30, 1931, a calendar to June, 1932, tables showing Easter and other holidays to 1936. There are also memoranda pages, postal and other information, and a spongable tablet. The size is suitable for the pocket—six inches by three, and a quarter of an inch thick. The Lecture Agency, Outer Temple, W.C.2, 3*s.* 6*d.*

The date for this year's Haslemere Festival of Chamber Music is from August 19-31. The programmes promise to be even more interesting than usual. Tickets and full particulars from Messrs. Charman, High Street, Haslemere. Members of the Dolmetsch Foundation are entitled to a reduction of ten per cent. on all tickets. For information as to the Foundation apply to the Secretary, 37, Walbrook, E.C.4.

Sixty Years Ago

From the Musical Times of May, 1869:

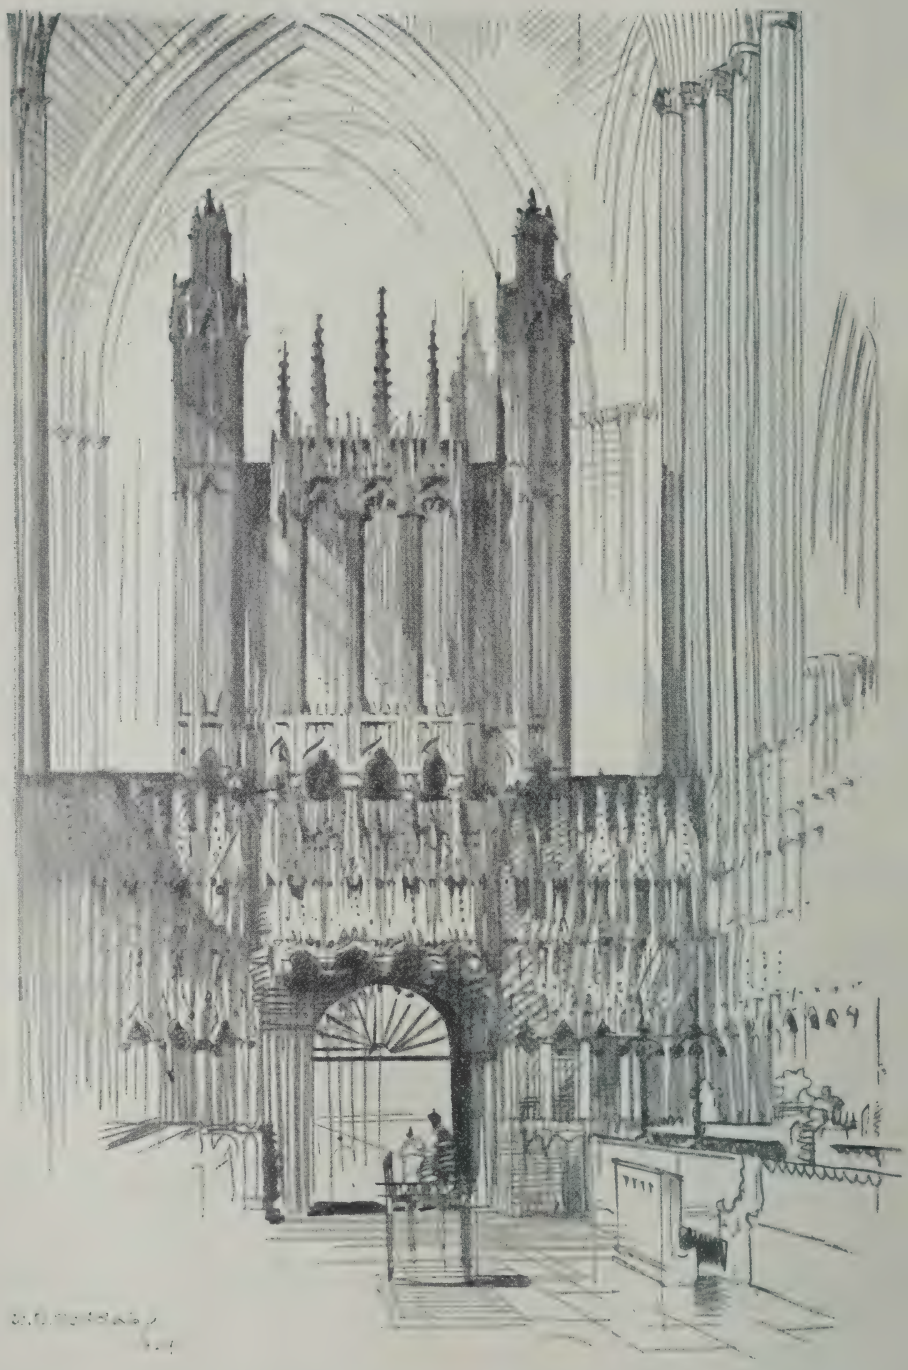
WARMED PIANOS AND HARMONIUMS (Price's Patent), made by London Pianoforte Company, for SALE or HIRE. Guaranteed in every respect. Unlike any other Piano, these, by means of two warm-water cylinders, of only the diameter of a wine glass, concealed under the keys, filled with one small kettle of water, and most easily handled, give a soft glow of warmth to the hands for three hours, thereby making willing pupils and playing an unmixed pleasure in winter, economizing fires and time, and ensuring suppleness of hands and more perfect execution. This improvement, safe to every part of the Piano, is invaluable alike to children, general players, and to the professional pianist, and has received, without one exception, the most unqualified approval of all who have tried it. Any Piano, Harmonium, or Organ Manual, may be adjusted with the warmers in two or three days, with profit to the profession and advantage to the players, especially in churches; and each instrument so adjusted, may be seen and tried at the Patentees. Licenses to the trade £1 per instrument. Directions and drawings (and a working model at request) offered. Address to the Patentee, 184, Regent Street. First floor.



THE ORGAN, YORK MINSTER

(From a drawing by W. D. Suddaby)

THE ORGAN AT YORK MINSTER: AN APPEAL

The Dean of York has issued an appeal on behalf of the York Minster organ. The reader's first impulse will be to exclaim against the modern tendency to make organs ever larger, but he will discover that the York appeal has far more reasonable bases.

Here, condensed, are facts and figures that seem to us to make out a case so strong as to need little more than bare mention.

After twenty-five years of daily use the whole of the mechanism is in so bad a condition that it has already broken down in part, and a total failure may soon follow. Entirely new mechanism is, in fact, necessary in order to prevent deterioration of the whole organ. As it would cost at least £20,000 to replace the instrument, the prompt spending of £2,892 on renewing the action is a prudent and economical step.

At the same time, it is easy to understand the desire of the authorities to take advantage of the dismantling of the organ to make some changes and a few additions in the matter of stops. It is proposed to add to the Pedal Organ an Ophicleide (16-ft.), Posaune (8-ft.), and Clarion (4-ft.) in order to provide a more adequate bass than at present exists for the Tuba Mirabilis added in 1917. These additions will cost £275. Another suggested alteration in the Pedal organ is the replacement of the present Violone (£200). On the Choir organ a Mixture is to take the place of the Clarinet, which will be transferred to the Solo organ (£90). The addition of a Viol d'Orchestre to the Solo organ is provided for, the money having already been given. It is desired also to reconstruct the Solo swell-box so as to include the Clarinet, Viol d'Orchestre, and Tubas (£300). The necessary alterations in the blowing will cost £50.

The Dean states that the additional stops can wait, if necessary. He adds:

> With many other Minster needs pressing, I hesitate to ask for so large a sum as £3,927 all at once. But our joy and pride in our far-famed and lovely instrument make me hope that lovers . . of music, and especially lovers of the Minster music, will long, as I do, to make it a really perfect thing.

There is also the practical point that it will be an obvious advantage and economy to do the whole of the work at one time.

The appeal is made especially 'to Yorkshire people all the world over.' But York, its Minster, and its splendid musical traditions combine to make the matter national rather than diocesan. We therefore commend it warmly to our readers, Yorkshire and otherwise, at home and abroad.

Church and Organ Music

The organ at Barking Parish Church has been overhauled by Messrs. J. W. Walker, who have added octave and sub-octave couplers to the Swell and enclosed the Choir. The re-opening took place on March 14, when Dr. Harold Darke gave a recital, playing Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor, the Overture to Handel's 'Occasional Oratorio,' Saint-Saëns's Fantasia in E flat, Harwood's 'Pæan,' &c.

The Society of St. Gregory announces a three-days' Summer School of Plainsong to be held at Oxford on August 7-9. The Society is a newly-formed body with four aims:

1. To maintain the dignity of the Sacred Liturgy as the supreme instrument of congregational worship.
2. To carry out the wishes of the Church with regard to Church music; that is, to put into practice the instructions given by Pope Pius X. in his 'Motu Proprio' of November 22, 1903, on Church music, and confirmed by Pope Pius XI. in his Apostolic Constitution of December 28, 1928, on the same subject.
3. To provide each year a course of instruction in plainsong for Catholic choirmasters, teachers, and others practically interested.
4. To attempt, by mutual help, to find a solution for the practical problems of members.

For particulars concerning the Society, and the Summer School, write to Mr. Donald J. S. Edeson, 49, Cromwell Avenue, Highgate, N.6.

A vocal and organ recital was given in Blandford Parish Church on March 18 by the choir of Shillingstone, a neighbouring village, and their organist and trainer, Mr. Alexander Popham. The programme included a selection from 'The Dream of Gerontius,' and arias by Bach, Handel, and Mendelssohn, with organ solos played by Mr. Popham. Shillingstone is evidently favoured above the ordinary in its Church music, for its choir numbers nearly forty, and it announces a fifth annual concert of sacred music for May 1 with a capital list of choral and solo numbers by Handel, Mendelssohn, Tchaikovsky, Gounod, Stanford, and Walford Davies, together with solos for 'cello (Bach, Schumann, and Grieg) and organ (Franck and Tchaikovsky). Apart from the Church service side, such a choir must be of considerable educational and social value in a small community.

The annual Report of the Organists' Benevolent League shows a slight increase in receipts from the usual sources—recitals, concerts, &c. It is suggested that good results might come from efforts the proceeds of which should be shared between the League and local objects. A wider public is thus tapped, and the work of the League made better known. This plan has been tried successfully by the Glasgow Society of Organists. Among the 1928 donations was the sum of £45, being the first instalment of the proceeds from the 'Complete Organ Recitalist,' compiled and edited by Mr. Herbert Westerby.

A recital of motets was given by the choir of Ripon Cathedral on March 20, conducted by Dr. Charles Moody, who prefaced each item with helpful comments. The programme included Palestrina's 'God shall wipe away,' and 'Hear Thou in Heaven,' Victoria's 'Be not afraid, O Mary,' Allegri's Miserere, Battishill's 'O Lord, look down from Heaven,' Croce's 'Thou art beautiful,' &c. The singing reached a high standard. Dr. Moody also played organ solos by Franck and Karg-Elert.

At Bury St. Edmund's Cathedral, on April 11, Brahms's 'Requiem' and Schubert's 'Song of Miriam' were sung by the Musical Society. The soloists were Miss Elsie Suddaby and Mr. Frederick Woodhouse. Mr. Percy Hallam conducted. The instrumentalists were Miss Winifred Vyse (pianoforte), Mr. F. Seal (drums), and Mr. W. J. Mothersole (organ).

Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' was beautifully sung at All Saints', Bradford, Yorks, by the Bach Choir attached to the church, on March 27. The soloists were Miss Amy Reid, Miss Annie Redmayne, Mr. Allen Fouracre, and Mr. William Lovell. Mr. H. Percy Richardson was at the organ, and Mr. Charles Stott conducted.

Brahms's 'Requiem' was excellently sung by the choir of St. Chad's Church, Leeds, on March 15, with Miss Essie Simpson and Mr. Walter Batley as soloists, and Mr. Walter Walker as organist. Mr. H. Percy Richardson conducted.

Albert Ham's Cantata, 'The Solitudes of the Passion,' was sung at St. John the Baptist's, Cardiff, on March 24, directed by Mr. George H. Cole. Mr. Cole, by the way, has just completed forty years' service at St. John's.

Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper have reconstructed the organ at St. Matthew's Parish Church, Morningside, Edinburgh. The instrument is now a three-manual of thirty-two stops and twenty-six pistons.

The newly-appointed organist of the Chicago Stadium will do far more than play mere organ solos. We learn from the Diapason that he will also 'follow the action of the athletic events, playing the action of the bicycle races, toning up the hockey games, and enthusing the conventions—in fact, providing a musical background for the many and varied entertainments given at the Stadium.' He predicts 'not only great results, but also the opening of a new field for the expression of the organ.' A photograph shows him at the console of the Stadium organ, a six-manual with apparently some thousands of stop keys. There is a touch of irony in the fact that the organist who is thus about to 'enthuse the conventions' bears the illustrious name of Ralph Waldo Emerson.

DOMESTIC ITEM FROM A BUCKINGHAMSHIRE PARISH MAGAZINE

Letters to the Editor

'ORGAN PEDALLING, PAST AND PRESENT'

Sir,—I was very gratified to see such an illuminating article on the above subject, by 'Feste,' in the March issue of the Musical Times, as it dealt so freely with the book 'The Science of Organ Pedalling' (Ellingford-Meers). As one of the authors of that book, may I be allowed to make a few comments on the article. 'Feste' criticises the footing given in Ex. 2 (Musical Times, March, 1929, p. 221) as not being the only convenient one, and offers an alternative in Ex. 3.

The reasons why Ex. 1 and its accompanying footing are given at all are:

1. That it is typical of the note-finding exercises met with in many organ primers;
2. That the given footing prevents any lateral movement which must result from the consecutive use of the same toe or heel on successive notes.

The lateral movement of the limbs is as natural and necessary a footing movement as the oblique-angle movement of the feet, and the downward-knee-movement for heel notes; yet it is much better in the first note-finding exercises to avoid that particular kind of lateral movement which results from the consecutive use of toes or heels on successive notes, until some confidence has been gained in the movements which are occasioned in the playing of alternate toe and heel notes.

Students who have been trained from the outset to regard the oblique-angle movement of the feet as one of the prime essentials of pedalling will not find any trouble or difficulty when playing the R. heel 'F' and the R. toe 'B,' to which 'Feste' refers.

With regard to the 'liberal use of heels,' I did not know that I had given the impression that I imagined myself a pioneer in this particular. As far back as the date of the first edition of the Bridge and Higgs 'Bach' volumes, probably forty or more years ago, we meet with some very sane uses of the heels, in passages consisting of long keys only. (Vide Book 3, Bridge and Higgs 'Bach' Works, Novello.)

My contention is that the traditional custom of confining a student to the all-toe-where-possible method, during the earliest stages of pedalling, is as wrong to-day as it was a hundred years ago. I do not even regard the varied types of pedal board as an excuse or defence for the all-toe-where-possible theory, because it is inconceivable to think that even Bach allowed himself to strut about the board with toes only in the general run of his organ works, to say nothing of those few chorale-preludes in which he wrote a definite and separate part for each foot.

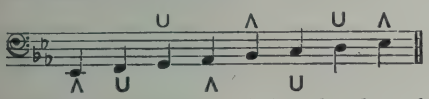
I cannot imagine that the man who defied the tuning theories of his day, and substantiated his defiance by producing the immortal 'Forty-eight,' eliminated the use of the heels excepting and only where necessity demanded, even presuming the board of his time prevented such a liberal use of heels as is possible to-day.

There are two traditional pedalling rules that are dying a very slow death, but the sooner they are recognised as futile and useless the better for the student. One is the use of toes only in the earliest exercises, and the other, that the knees must be kept still, confining the movement to the ankles.

The first is directly opposed to and inconsistent with the natural dictates of the board, viz., toe 'short' and heel 'long' key; and the second runs counter to nature herself, because the only way to play a heel note is to allow the knee to move downwards slightly.

'Feste' prefers his own footing of the extract from the Bach D major Fugue, as shown in Ex. 6. All well and good—but no student will appreciate any difficulty in the footing given in Ex. 5 if he has complete control and freedom over the oblique-angle-movement. 'Feste's' expression 'dodge type,' in reference to Ex. 7, is an excellent one, and the footing given in that example was shown Mr. Meers when he was having lessons from Parratt at the Royal College of Music.

In reference to our being four hundred years behind the Continent in adopting the pedal board, the comments of 'Feste' are to the point. We certainly did not take over the technique as well! I wonder why? In Lemmens's Organ School, published about 1870, the scale of E flat is given as follows:



Mr. Meers always maintained that the above footing was a very logical and natural way of pedalling that scale, and we both felt that this was a very early instance of 'dovetailing the feet,' and this, be it remembered, was done by Lemmens, who had the older type of straight board. Not only is the toe 'short' and heel 'long' key principle demonstrated here plainly enough, but the oblique-angle-movement of the feet is a sine qua non.

Mr. Meers had gone to infinite trouble and care, as was his wont in anything he undertook, and concentrated his energies on footing to such an extent, that no existing published primer seemed adequate to him in regard to pedalling. A few years after Novello published my first two organ primers (1917-18), he came to Liverpool to see me, and from that time, 1923, until the book 'The Science of Organ Pedalling' was in proof stage, we wrote and discussed footings from almost every conceivable angle. He and I had consulted such books as Rinck, Schneider, Lemmens, Horner, Stainer, Spark, Steggall, Archer, Best, Mansfield, Bellairs, Pearce, Buck, Nilson, Alcock, Hull. None of these primers give as definitely essential rules of pedalling the following:

1. The downward-knee-movement, which is a resultant natural action when playing heel notes;
2. The necessity to acquire freedom and control in the oblique-angle movement of the feet;
3. That each toe and heel should be turned towards the direction of its next note wherever possible and practicable.

It was the publication of these in my Novello primers that brought Mr. Meers to me, for, as he himself expressed it, 'here, at least, there is something fresh, and a welcome breaking away from the traditional.'

Further, neither of us had ever seen the term 'oblique-angle-movement' referred to or used in primers prior to my Novello ones, nor had either of us heard the term used by others in the course of the years we were taking lessons—I at the R.C.M., 1893-98, and Mr. Meers at the same institution several years later, and both under Parratt.

The comments of 'Feste' on the crossing of the feet are apt. This old rule of feet-crossing is the natural outcome of the pernicious all-toe-where-possible method. Feet-crossing is a natural part of scale-playing, but it is a much saner type than is possible with toe-use only, because the suppleness, freedom, and firmness which the development of the oblique-angle-movement brings about causes the limbs to pass naturally in front of, or behind, each other, as the case may be, until there is evolved a natural disposition to 'walk the pedal board,' and for the feet to play such passages as demand it with what I have termed the 'dovetailed toe-and-heel footing.' (Vide 'Science of Organ Pedalling,' Ex. 65.)

In the April issue there are two interesting letters on the subject, and I shall be glad if I may be allowed to reply to these also.

Mr. Jevons's criticism of the footing of Ex. 1 is dealt with in my comments on the article by 'Feste.' With regard to the extract from the Bach D major Fugue, he writes: 'Of the three ways of pedalling this passage,' &c. Surely, with the hopeful confidence which Mr. Jevons rather patronisingly places on the possibilities of 'oblique footing,' it seems a pity to limit the footing of this passage to merely three ways.

I give below over thirty ways of footing it, and not one of them would cause any difficulty to the student who has been taught from the outset to allow the knee to move downwards slightly for the heel notes, to cultivate the oblique-angle-movement of the feet, and to see that each toe and each heel is turned towards the direction of the next note it has to play, wherever this is possible. Some of these footings would be easier than others, but none would be actually difficult:

The other points of Mr. Jevons's letter do not concern pedalling.

In the letter from Miss Morris, references are made to Horner's 'Pedal Exercises,' and Stainer's first two pages of pedal exercises.

Horner's pedal exercises are excellent, but although the first exercises appearing in his Book 1 indicate the use of heels as well as toes, he definitely states at the beginning of the book that students should learn the position of the pedal-board notes from Stainer's 'Organ Primer' (par. 78, et seq.), to which book his own two primers are supplementary.

Miss Morris's idea in regarding the first two pages of Stainer's pedal exercises as consisting of two voices is sound commonsense, but Stainer gives these exercises for note-finding purposes, and distinctly indicates that the toes only are to be used. He did not intend the heels to be brought into play at this early stage, and in this particular, viz., toes only at first, he followed the line of his predecessors, as he himself was imitated by his successors.—Yours, &c.,

Liverpool. HERBERT F. ELLINGFORD.

THE HALLÉ SOCIETY

SIR,—It is with diffidence that I approach you on the matter of your Manchester critic's article on 'Music at Manchester,'* but it seems unfair to the Hallé Committee, Sir Hamilton Harty, and the Hallé audience to allow it to pass unchallenged.

The question of new music at orchestral concerts is, and always will be, the subject of much contention. The critic is, of course, entitled to his view, a reasonable one, that the contemporary should not be neglected. At the same time, however, he should not permit personal predilections to outweigh his sense of the economic basis of musical art in this country. Music, like everything else, is a commodity—even though it is spiritual—which is subject to the laws of supply and demand. The musical culture of Manchester is, if a very solid and real thing, a little unprogressive—a fact the Hallé Society has to bear in mind in progressing slowly. The public demand on the big orchestral organizations is for proved and standard works, and if the things they desire to hear are not available, they simply stay away from the concerts. Since it is the duty of a society like the Hallé to remain in existence and, if possible, pay its way, then it follows that, as a policy, it must give the people a good proportion of the music they want to hear.

A small minority (of which I am one), either from curiosity or the wish to keep abreast of contemporary developments, are desirous of hearing more new music. Naturally enough! But a minority cannot do much towards keeping the Hallé Society in a flourishing state, and perforce must be content with the study of scores until the majority, the people who make the concerts possible, cultivate the urge towards modernism.

* See March number, p. 265.

How the urge towards modernism is to be developed is, in my opinion, little concern of the Hallé Society, whose aim is cultural rather than educational. Modernism does not inevitably mean progress. In many instances it is pure experimentalism. As a concrete example, Honegger's 'Pacific 231' may be cited; a work which adds nothing to æsthetics, musical perception, or beauty. One or two of the works your critic names as aching to be done are in the same category. We know what happened when the Honegger work was performed at the Hallé, and it is a fairly safe guess to gauge the reception of Schönberg's Five Orchestral Pieces. Other works in 'C. H.'s' list will possibly be done as time permits (in the meantime we can only hope they will prove more worthy than some of this season's novelties), but twenty concerts, each of about two hours' duration, cannot be expected to hold the world's output of worthy music. I need not extend the argument on these lines, it should be obvious enough; but I do maintain that in view of the economic facts, 'C. H.'s' demands are lacking in balance.

I do not agree that it is a 'plain fact' that Manchester is declining from the position held in former days. The number of composers represented in this season's concerts is fifty-two, against the thirty-eight of Dr. Richter's last season at Manchester. It is presumably of Dr. Richter that 'C. H.' is thinking when he refers to the shaping of the appreciation for Strauss. Ironically enough, Dr. Richter's retirement from the conductorship of the Hallé came mainly through the attacks of those who would have the modern at all costs. Anyhow, not to labour the point unduly, I think it may be stated as a fact that even with their basic bulk of classical works the Hallé programmes are more versatile to-day than ever before.

The attack on the conductor is apparently a personal matter, yet one point arises from it that demands comment. Elgar's 'Falstaff' was finely played, which is of course beside the point, but nobody can deny the critic's right to protest at the 'cut' in a reasonable way. To suggest, however, that a musician of Harty's proved calibre is capable of cutting a work merely from caprice is an absurdity which need not be taken seriously.—Yours, &c., JOHN F. RUSSELL.

WILLIAM BYRD AND PHILIP DE MONTE

SIR,—In 1921, Dr. G. van Doorslaer, president of the Archæological Circle of Malines, published an interesting monograph on the life and works of the 16th-century Netherland composer Philip de Monte, in which mention is made of a MS. in the British Museum containing a Motet for eight voices by de Monte, 'Super flumina Babilonis,' with the notice appended 'sent by him to Mr. Bird, 1583,' which is immediately followed by a Motet by Byrd, also for eight voices, 'Quomodo cantabimus,' with the notice appended 'made by Mr. Wm. Byrd to send in to Mr. Philip de Monte, 1584.' The Motet by Byrd has only now been published for the first time in the recent vol. 9 of 'Tudor Church Music,' but without any reference to this particular MS. as an authority for the text. Apparently the editors have overlooked this MS. and the interesting connections which it reveals between the composition of Byrd and that of Philip de Monte, as they express the conjecture that Byrd may have composed the whole Psalm 'Super flumina,' of which 'Quomodo cantabimus' would be the surviving second part. They also print in an Appendix a fragment which they suppose to belong to the lost first part.

To Mr. H. B. Collins, as an acknowledged authority on Byrd MSS., I applied for information about the British Museum MS., and he has assured me of its existence, and of the truth of Dr. van Doorslaer's statements with regard to it. He informs me that it is a vocal score of the 1575 Cantiones of Tallis and Byrd made by Dr. John Alcock, of Lichfield, about the year 1763, with the two Motets of de Monte and Byrd at the end. Probably the fact of the bulk of the MS. being only a reproduction of the 1575 Cantiones caused the two Motets at the end to be overlooked or forgotten. It may, however, be of some interest and importance in musical history to know the circumstances of Byrd's composing this Motet, and the friendly relations between him and de Monte which the MS. reveals.

In no life of Byrd hitherto published is there any mention of his personal acquaintance with any musician of the Continent except Alfonso Ferabosco. Philip de Monte was born at Malines in 1521, and is now known to have spent a short time in England, between July, 1554, and September, 1555, as a member of the Spanish Chapel of Philip II. when Philip came to England for his marriage with Queen Mary. It is during this visit to England that van Doorslaer surmises that de Monte may have made the acquaintance with Thomas Byrd, member of the English Chapel Royal, and with William Byrd, his son, then a mere youth. Some doubt has been thrown on this alleged parentage of William Byrd, but the fact of de Monte's acquaintance with Byrd might lend support to the earlier tradition of this parentage, and of London rather than Lincoln being his birthplace; also of his having been brought up as a chorister of the Chapel Royal, under Tallis.

De Monte ceased to be a member of the Spanish Chapel when Philip of Spain left England after his marriage. From 1568 to his death in 1603 he was the Imperial Kapellmeister first at Vienna and afterwards at Prague. The acquaintance with Byrd was not his only link of connection with England. One of his pupils at Prague was a learned Englishwoman, Elizabeth Weston, a poetess of Latin verses, who celebrated his praises and expressed her enthusiastic admiration of his music in forty-six lines of Latin elegiacs.

The Dictionary of National Biography informs us that the father of Elizabeth Weston, as being a recusant and probably implicated in some of the Romanist plots against Queen Elizabeth, had had his whole property in England confiscated, and with his wife and family had left England to settle at Prague. In the record of Byrd's life we are told of his having come into contact with the Jesuit father William Weston, but there is nothing to indicate that this Weston was in any way related to the Westons at Prague. It may have been, however, through the Weston family at Prague that de Monte kept up some communication with Byrd in England.

At Malines, his birthplace, there has been a recent revival of interest in de Monte by the performance and publication of some of his works. He would appear to have been the most prolific composer of his time, since he published no fewer than thirty-four books of secular, besides three books of spiritual, madrigals, nine books of Motets, and one of Masses, with thirty more Masses remaining in MSS.—Yours, &c.,

LAUSANNE MUSIC CONFERENCE

SIR,—The Committee of the Summer Holiday Music Conference for British Empire and American Musicians and Educationists, to be held at Lausanne in the first week of August, has now prepared its programme, some details of which will be of interest. In the list of lecturers, chairmen of sections, &c., British and American music will be represented in equal numbers. The names of the American participants are not yet completely available, but we have already an assurance that the leaders of musical education in the United States will be with us. The following are the names of British authorities who will take part:

Chairmen of Sections.—(1.) Elementary School Music, C. N. Linfoot; (2.) Secondary School Music, A. Forbes Milne; (3.) University Music, Prof. F. H. Shera; (4.) Church Music, Harvey Grace; (5.) Vocal Teaching and Choral Training, Steuart Wilson; (6.) Pianoforte Teaching, Ernest Fowles; (7.) Orchestral Work in Schools, Clement Spurling; (8.) Competition Festivals, Dr. W. G. Whittaker.

Lecturers and Others.—Dr. W. G. Whittaker, Percy A. Scholes, Edwin Evans, Jaques-Dalcroze, Dr. C. W. Saleeby, Dr. Edward Bairstow.

The Educational and Ecclesiastical Authorities of Lausanne have courteously placed at our disposal the University building and the Cathedral (the latter especially for the use of the Church Music section of the Conference).

Those who wish to be present should communicate with the Registrar, 2, Albany Courtyard, Piccadilly, London, W.1.—Yours, &c., W. H. HADOW.

EMANCIPATED POETRY

SIR,—The analogy to which you call attention, between the advanced composer and the emancipated poet, if 'poet' be his right designation, is attractive, and opens up a fruitful subject for inquiry.

The art-form affected by Miss Stein, and at times by other writers such as James Joyce, is familiar to psychopathologists, and by them termed 'verbigeration.' Its chief exponents (other than the aforesaid emancipated poets) are the 'schizophrenics,' who make up a large proportion of those whom the public affectionately terms 'loonies.' Here, for example, is an actual specimen from the pen of a writer who has been insane for many years; if, perhaps, less incoherent than Miss Stein's work, it has the authentic inspiration about it:

> 'To Grand Abba Dad Grand Dad much more Old World and Worlds and so forth—and from before Old Worlds and Worlds above and below and everywhere. Brain much more Mind much more Power much more below. From Lady Divine Queen Iza Ming Za Izaza Izagaza Izaga Zaza.'

In these days, when ramblings are hailed as poetry, and paintings, such as those of the unhappy Van Gogh, which can be paralleled over and over again from our mental hospitals, and all kinds of mattoid sculpture are held up for admiration, we may feel reasonably certain that the urge for exhibiting the workings of the diseased mind is responsible for some of the tendencies of modern music.

To listen to advanced compositions is often so ungrateful an experience that the ordinary listener naturally turns to the expert, that is, the musical critic, for an accurate diagnosis of the composer's mental state, and a ruling as to how much is inspiration and how much verbigeration. And it is a disappointment when he finds, as too often happens, that the critic, like certain other timid practitioners, takes refuge in a refusal to 'certify' the patient's condition, and contents himself by beating the big drum and inviting the listener to walk up and settle the matter for himself.—Yours, &c., W. F. H. BLANDFORD.

Isleworth.

WHAT DID MR. GREWGIOUS HEAR?

SIR,—'Dickensian' is surely asking for too much. There is not the slightest suggestion in the passage he quotes that the music was depicting or illustrating a 'sea' or 'waters.' He gives a wrong impression by printing certain words in italics: Dickens did not, and therefore we may be sure that the 'sea' and 'living waters' are his own metaphors. If he had intended them for anything else, he would probably have put them in inverted commas.

Clearly he is describing the conclusion of a simple service: the prayer of St. Chrysostom (read) is followed by a resonant 'Amen' from choir and organ. The Grace is then read, and the last 'Amen' is perhaps a little more elaborate, after which the organ goes on into a (possibly extemporised) voluntary.

Mr. Grewgious sees the living waters coming out. Obviously, if the choir and organ had drowned the voice of the priest in a 'sea of music,' the choir themselves must be waters, presumably 'living.'

By the way, the date quoted (1850) is surely a mistake for 1870.—Yours, &c., T. L. MARTIN.

St. Paul's School, W.14.

WANTED: A CLEARING HOUSE FOR CONCERT DATES

SIR,—Cannot musicians take a little more note of one another's engagements? Consider Thursday, March 21:

Royal Philharmonic Society, with (a rare event) the performance of Delius's 'Appalachia';

First performance (at R.C.M.) of Vaughan Williams's new opera;

Annual Dinner of Union of Graduates in Music;

Madrigal Society's Dinner.

Why do we do this sort of thing? Surely we can at any rate keep off the 'Phil.' nights—which were announced for the whole season about seven months in advance of the date mentioned?

Such clashing as this (and it 's pretty common) is very hard on visitors from the provinces or abroad, and probably just as hard on many Londoners.

Are musicians business men?—Yours, &c.,

PERCY A. SCHOLES.

Montreux, Switzerland.

FAUX-BOURDON AND DOUBLE COUNTERPOINT

SIR,—The piece of counterpoint quoted by Mr. van den Borren in his article 'The Mystery of Faux-Bourdon Solved' is described by him as 'a complex form of repetition which results in what we call to-day double-counterpoint.' But it is not so; for there is no inversion. This interchange of parts is often found in madrigals of the 16th century between two trebles—I suppose for the greater interest of the singers. It lingered far into the 17th century, and may be noticed in the Overture to Carissimi's oratorio 'Baltazar.' On the other hand, genuine double counterpoint reaches back to the latter part of the 12th century.—Yours, &c.,

ARTHUR T. FROGGATT.

5, Richmond Mansions, Denton Road, Twickenham.

THE DATE OF BYRD'S MASSES

SIR,—Owing to a printer's error, for which I trust I am not responsible, the same mistake is repeated which it was the object of my letter to correct. Let me try again.*

In his earlier publications, up to 1591, Byrd uses exclusively the barred semicircle—which it will be safer to leave your readers to draw for themselves. In his later publications, namely, the 'Gradualia' and the 'Psalmes,' &c., of 1611, he uses only the unbarred semicircle.

The five-part Mass has the barred semicircle, and the other two Masses the unbarred. I hope this is now clear.—Yours, &c.,

H. B. COLLINS.

Birmingham.

BEETHOVEN AND DAVY

SIR,—The other day, when playing Beethoven's C major Sonata for 'cello and pianoforte, Op. 102, No. 1, I noticed a great similarity between a theme which appears in the Finale several times:

and the last line of Davy's song, 'The Bay of Biscay.'

I have never read anything about this in any book on Beethoven, and I wonder if any reader has. I suppose it is not possible that Beethoven could have known the song; and I should be grateful if a reader could inform me as to the date of it.

May I add how I wish that there could be more performances of this beautiful Sonata by first-rate artists; as far as I know there is not even a gramophone record of it.—Yours, &c.,

E. BENJAMIN BRITTEN.

21, Kirkley Cliff Road, Lowestoft.

* May we try again, too? The slip last month was due to a proof going astray. Here is the barred semicircle Mr. Collins asked for: 𝄐.—EDITOR.

SCHUMANN'S FOURTH SYMPHONY

SIR,—The striking similarity between the two themes quoted by Mr. Ovenden in your April issue, viz., the second subject in the slow movement of Beethoven's second Symphony and the second subject in the last movement of Schumann's fourth Symphony, in D minor (wrongly referred to by Mr. Ovenden as the first), has been well known to musicians for many years. It must be quite fifty years ago when I first heard that Schumann's fourth Symphony was greeted with a storm of abuse by a great many critics anxious to belittle Schumann, who referred to the above similarity as a mere copy of Beethoven.

Nevertheless, the fact remains that all composers are, or have been, imitators more or less.

Mr. Ovenden, however, should not allow a brilliant performance to blind his better judgment. Delightfully charming as many of Schumann's themes are, the workmanship is often poor, and the orchestration as a whole leaves much to be desired.—Yours, &c.,

F. KILVINGTON HATTERSLEY.

10, The Avenue, Filey, Yorks.

MUSICIANS AND 'HONOURS'

SIR,—I very cordially endorse the reference in 'Occasional Notes' to the inadequacy of the honour conferred on Frederick Delius. When it was rumoured that his name would appear in the list, there were very few, I am convinced, who anticipated anything other than a knighthood. I do not think anyone on scanning these lists from time to time would have the hardihood to claim that recognition of our distinguished musicians is overdone. I cannot help wondering how much longer certain other representative men are to wait for some mark of appreciation.—Yours, &c.,

WILL BEAVAN.

Hereford.

A BACH DISARRANGEMENT

SIR,—In the April issue of the Musical Times, 'Ariel,' under 'Wireless Notes,' refers to a Bach 'Prelude, Chorale, and Fugue,' played by military bands. This is arranged for orchestra by Abert (it is the original form), and published by Messrs. Ries & Ehrler. It has been transcribed from the full orchestral score for military band by Sir Dan Godfrey, and his arrangement is published by Messrs. Chappell. As far as I can trace, the Chorale which is inserted is an original one by Abert.—Yours, &c.,

HAROLD T. SCULL.

18, Great Marlborough Street, W.1.

NO MARKS, PLEASE!

SIR,—Will you allow me to appeal through your columns to all who hire orchestral parts to respect the rule of the publishers not to make marks of any kind on the music. I have to spend hours trying to rub out marks which are frequently made in blue pencil and even in ink, not only on the band parts but, what is much worse, on the full scores. All that is necessary is to write or type out any alterations or 'cuts' and place a copy of each on the music stands.—Yours, &c.,

A. M. GIFFORD.

We are obliged to hold over several long letters on various subjects. Among some that we are unable to insert are a few dealing with the nationality of Delius. Several corespondents write, with what strikes us as unnecessary warmth, pointing out that Delius was of mixed Dutch and German extraction, and that he had spent most of his life abroad. To quote one letter, 'Delius is the least national of all living composers, but one thing he is not, and that is an English composer, either by ancestry, environment, taste, style, or anything else,'—in short, how dare England make so presumptuous a claim!

Competition Festival Record

BARNSLEY (March 22-23).—Here were nearly four hundred entries, and West Riding keenness. Among the most distinguished competitors were Barnsley Girls' High School; Miss Seymour Allen, contralto, winner of the rose bowl; Miss Hilda Stocks, of Barnsley, the junior soprano; and Netherthong Male-Voice Choir (Mr. W. E. Poppleton). The severest criticisms were aimed at the test-pieces for male-voice and mixed-voice quartets, both being examples of out-moded humour.

BEDFORD (March 4-16).—As is well known, the festival idea which was planted here in 1921 found itself in miraculously fertile ground. In that year there were nearly seven hundred entries. This year there were nearly two thousand, and it was claimed, probably with truth, that the Bedford County Musical Festival was, after the London Festival, the largest in the country. Class 1 was for Infants' Choirs, age below seven; class 177 was for sword-dancing by boys from within the thirty-mile radius. Between these two figures the syllabus provided for all sorts and conditions of musical and kindred activities, including, on the literary side, original poems and impromptu speeches. Certain of the competitions are open to all comers, but it is on the work of the neighbourhood that the activity of the Festival thrives. Bedford choirs, for instance, took the lead in all but one of the open choral classes, the exception being the tenor-lead male-voice class, won by Primrose Hill, Northampton (Mr. F. A. Facer). The other first prize-winners were: Male-voice alto lead—Bedford Liberal Club (Mr. H. W. Barker); Female-voice—Mrs. Palmer's Ladies' Choir, Bedford; Mixed-voice—Mrs. Palmer's Choir, in competition with three other Bedford choirs. In a class for madrigal-singing the Howard Singers were ahead of the Clarendon Singers—both of them Bedford choirs.

BOGNOR (March 20-22).—Ninety-eight choirs entered in the West Sussex Choral Competitions—proving again that the best way of encouraging choral singing by means of a competitive festival is to exclude other forms of competition. In the small area covered by this Festival the art is now busily and earnestly cultivated. The principal competitions were a series of contests between choirs from Arundel, Barnham, Bognor, Chichester, Horsham, Petworth, and Worthing, in which the first and second prizes were distributed fairly evenly all round.

BRIGG.—At the twenty-seventh North Lincolnshire competitions the entries nearly doubled the previous record. Elocution classes, introduced for the first time, brought in a hundred and twenty-four competitors. Choirs from Brigg, Saxby, South Ferraby, Brocklesby, North Kelsey, Ulceby, and Killingholme won the chief prizes.

BRISTOL EISTEDDFOD (March 14-23).—The bulk of the time was taken up by solo classes (a hundred and twenty-seven entries in the novice classes for sopranos and contraltos), elocution (eighteen classes), and an elaborate scheme of national, classical, and operatic dancing, with forty-nine classes. In the few adult choral competitions, prizes were won by G.O.K. Choir Weston-super-Mare (Mrs. P. Palmer), Glanffrwd Male-Voice Choir (Mr. W. R. Lewis), and Plymouth Philharmonic.

LYTHAM (April 10-13).—This is not a large Festival, but it is highly esteemed by the Lancashire choral faculty, which is usually well represented. Among the thirty-six choirs that entered on this occasion the most successful was the Blackpool Glee and Madrigal Society (Mr. Herbert Whittaker), first in the female-voice, male-voice, and mixed-voice classes. The mixed-voice test piece was Bach's 'O Light Everlasting.' 'Jesu, Joy of man's desiring,' was sung in the Church choir class. There was also a very good series of solo-singing competitions, and a successful children's day. Next year the Festival will be moved back to June, its traditional month.

MORPETH (March 22-23).—At the twenty-fourth Wansbeck Festival seventeen choirs took part in the senior classes, the principal winners being Prudhoe Gleemen and Blyth Co-operative Choir. A correspondent tells us that most of the male-voice members are pitmen, and during these months of unemployment in the coalfields they have made good use of their leisure by devoting themselves to choral work.

PONTEFRACT (March 13-16).—Personal triumphs added interest to this year's Festival (the twenty-first). One of the successful school choirs was from the village of Wragley. Mr. W. T. Senior, who has been bringing in choirs from this school from the first years of the Festival, has also competed as a baritone soloist for fourteen years, never earning more than the second prize; this time he was placed first. Master Kenneth Watson, a Pontefract boy, added one more to his thirty-six first-prizes for pianoforte-playing. Other school choirs that did well were those of Kippax and Castleford Welbeck Street. In the chief adult choral competitions the winning choirs were Selby Philharmonic Society, Bramley Ladies' Choir, Sharlston and District Choral Union (male-voice), and Ouseburn and District Choral Society. Twenty-two choirs took part in all.

STRATFORD, E. London (March 8-16).—After over forty years of whole-hearted work as hon. secretary of this Festival, Mr. John Graham has retired, and carries with him the thanks of many thousands. He is succeeded by Mr. E. J. Holford, F.R.C.O. In its forty-seventh year, the Festival maintained its steady growth, the entries having risen to four thousand two hundred. The well-arranged all-round syllabus still responds to the needs of the neighbourhood. This time, however, country dancing was introduced as a new feature, with but a few entries to begin with; but it is well known how this form of amusement catches on. In the principal choral classes the prize-winners were the following: Elementary Schools (boys), Kensington Avenue (Mr. Arthur Cummins); Elementary Schools (girls), Shaftesbury Road, Forest Gate (Miss Clara Cummins); Female-voice choirs, Dalston and Highbury Literary Institute (Mr. Edmund Sharkey); Choral societies (local and open), Fellowship Choir of All Hallows' Church (Mr. G. Beck).

TUNBRIDGE WELLS (March 14, 15, 19, 20).—The West Kent Festival was particularly successful in the school choir competitions. On the first day Groombridge School, entering the Festival for the first time, carried off the chief prizes, including that for the best aggregate; on the next day St. Augustine's, Tunbridge Wells, was almost as conspicuous. Frant and Sevenoaks Weald also did well. Frant singers were also to the front in adult choir competitions. In the chief classes, held on the last day, the winning choirs were Wadhurst (part-song and madrigal classes), Groombridge (female-voice), and Tunbridge Wells (male-voice). The Festival concluded with a performance of Mozart's 'Requiem' by combined choirs under Dr. Malcolm Sargent.

WINCHESTER (March 8-14).—Sixty-three choirs competed, each being put to a series of tests and assessed by their aggregate marks. The winners were Winchester County School, Owdesbury School, 'The Worthies' (Women's Institute), and the choirs of Bishopstoke, Baughurst, Overton, and Winchester City. The feature of the Festival was, according to tradition, the fine series of concerts that closed the proceedings on the five days. On each occasion there were an orchestra and well-known soloists, besides the massed choirs of the day. The conductors were Mr. Herbert Wiseman, Dr. Sargent (twice), Sir Hugh Allen, and Dr. Dyson, and the music included Act 1 of 'Lohengrin,' 'Samson,' the 'Sea Symphony,' and the 'Enigma' Variations.

Other important competitions that preceded Easter were as follows:

The N.W. Middlesex Festival at Harrow (March 2-16); Hastings (March 11-16); the sixth Festival of the Folkestone Rotary Club (March 13-16); the Teesdale Festival at Barnard Castle and the Central Northants Festival at Northampton; Brighouse; the Derbyshire and N. Staffordshire competitions at Derby; the seventh Clare Festival; the twenty-first Tynedale Festival, at Hexham; Mansfield; the Swaledale Festival, at Thirsk; the second Andover Festival; the eighth at Stinchcombe Hill; the Cambridgeshire Festival at Cambridge; the South Somerset Competition at Yeovil; the Festival organized by the Jewish Chronicle at Kingsway Hall, on April 8-10.

At Redhill the choral tests, junior and senior, were taken from a specially-composed competition cantata, 'The Holy Child,' by Eric Gritton, of which a complete performance was given at the end of the Festival.

SCOTLAND

Arbroath.—The fourth Arbroath and District Festival, which now draws competitors from all over the county of Angus, including the City of Dundee, ran for three days at Arbroath, and was well supported. Principal awards: Mixed Choirs, Dundee Gaelic Musical Association; Men's Choirs, Tay Choir, Dundee; Women's Choirs, Brechin Girls' Club; School Choirs, Townhead School, Montrose, and Arbroath High School; String Orchestras, Morgan Academy, Dundee; Vocal Solos—General, Roland Ewing, Arbroath; Scots Folk-Song, David Drury, Arbroath; Pianoforte Solos, Katherine H. M'Lauchlan, Arbroath; Violin Solos, Edward J. Robertson, Dundee; Scottish Country Dancing, 1st Arbroath Girl Guides and Boy Scouts; 33rd Angus Girl Guides and 2nd Angus Boy Scouts; 2nd Arbroath Girl Guides.

East of Scotland Co-operative.—The ninth East of Scotland Co-operative Festival was held at Portobello, near Edinburgh. Principal awards: Mixed Choirs, St. Cuthbert's, Edinburgh; Junior Choirs, Bathgate; Scottish Country Dancing, Armadale.

Fife, Kinross, and Clackmannan.—The tenth Fife, Kinross, and Clackmannan Festival, now entirely confined to schools within these counties, was held at Kirkcaldy. Principal awards: Choirs, Buckhaven; Bell Baxter School, Cupar; Kennaway; M'Lean School, Dunfermline; Moss-side; St. Margaret's, Dunfermline; Primary High School, Kirkcaldy; Kelty; Orchestras, Kirkcaldy High School; Scottish Country Dancing, Mars Training Ship; Kirkcaldy High School; M'Lean School, Dunfermline.

Fife, Kinross, and Clackmannan Co-operative.—Held at Lochgelly. Principal awards: Mixed Choirs, Lochgelly and Kelty; Junior Choirs, Kelty, Townhill, and Leven.

Lanarkshire (Upper Ward).—Held at Lanark. Principal awards: Mixed Choirs: Lanark Choral Society, Biggar Choral Society, Coalburn Choral Union; Church Choirs, Cambusnethan U.F. Church; String Orchestras, Peter Lamb's Orchestra, Motherwell; Scottish Country Dancing, Linnville Dancers; Pianoforte Solos, Nancy B. Hogg, Lanark; Violin Solos, Jean M'Canley, Fauldhouse.

Monklands.—The fifth Monklands Festival, which is held in alternate years at Coatbridge and Airdrie, ran for nine days at Coatbridge, and was well supported by the public. Principal awards: Women's Choirs, Greenhead Musical Association, Caldercrux Musical Association; Junior Choirs, St. Patrick's Girls' Guild Choir; Church Choirs, Gartsherrie Parish Church, Coatbridge; School Choirs, Drumpark Special School, All Saints' School; Scottish Country Dancing, 1st Coatbridge Girl Guides; Vocal Solos, Dorothy Fraser, Glasgow; Violin Solos, David Ferrier, Greenock; Hugh R. Byres, Glasgow; 'Cello Solos, Saul Yaffie, Glasgow.

Scottish Co-operative.—The twenty-sixth Scottish Co-operative Festival, the oldest in Scotland, was held at Paisley. Principal awards: Mixed Choirs, Barrhead; Women's Choirs, Dumbarton Equitable; Junior Choirs, Dumbarton Equitable.

Stirlingshire.—The ninth Stirlingshire Festival, formerly held at Stirling and Falkirk in alternate years, but now permanently located at Falkirk owing to the lack of support from the Stirling public, ran for a week and had good entries. Principal awards: Mixed Choirs, Kilmarnock Lyric Choir; Falkirk Choral Union; Men's Choirs, Kilsyth Co-operative Choir; Carron Works, Falkirk; Women's Choirs, Boness Ladies' Choir; Church Choirs, Craigmailen U.F. Church, Linlithgow; Junior Choirs, Kilsyth Co-operative Junior Choir; Falkirk High School; Trinity Congregational Church, Falkirk; Boys' Choirs, Grangemouth High School; School Choirs, Grangemouth High; Greenhill, Bonnybridge; Riverside, Stirling; Falkirk High; Scottish Country Dancing, 2nd St. Ninian's, 53rd Stirlingshire Girl Guides; Drumbowie School, Avonbridge; Vocal Solos—General, Helen Munro, Stirling; Gibson Dickson, Stirling; Scots Folk-Song, John Laidlaw, Stenhousemuir; Violin Solos, Margaret Davie, Stirling; Pianoforte Solos, Charles Henderson, Falkirk; Lieder, Lois Henderson (pianoforte) and Edmund Greig (tenor), Stirling.

IRELAND

Coleraine (March 11-15).—The growing popularity of this Festival called for an extension to five days. Verse-speaking is a strong feature, six classes bringing in two hundred and fifty candidates. Among the juvenile choirs the highest praise was won, for tone and utterance, by a band of infants under nine years of age from the Hon. Irish Society's School, Coleraine, conducted by Miss Perry. On the choral side this Festival still waits its full development.

Larne (March 15-22).—This was the fourth Festival organized by the Larne Musical Festival Association. The entries have expanded to over eight hundred, largely in the field which the Festival specially sets out to cultivate—that of the schools. On the reverse side, adult choral singing is still backward, especially among Church choirs. A new class was that for country fiddlers, a condition being that the candidates should have had no musical training. They were asked to play a reel, a jig, a hornpipe, and a slow melody. Twenty-two competed, and the competition is reported to have been a great success. The non-musical competitions produced eighteen poems, eight one-act plays, and a great deal of verse-speaking.

At the twenty-seventh Sligo Feis Ceoil (April 2-6) the entries numbered over a thousand.

Other traditional events were the Father Mathew Feis at Dublin and that at Cork, both in the first week of April.

A new Festival was held with success at Newry (April 8-11).

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

The last week of the Lent term was crammed full of happenings. The orchestral concert at Queen's Hall, on March 20, was of primary importance, for it was marked by some exceptionally good playing and singing. The orchestra was heard to great advantage in the second and third movements of Tchaikovsky's Symphony 'Pathétique,' conducted respectively by two students, Otto Ernst and Maurice Miles, and later in the afternoon in Goldmark's Overture 'Sakuntala,' conducted by Sir Henry Wood.

Miss Jacqueline Townshend played the first movement of Medtner's second Concerto. This student, a pupil of Mr. Craxton, is a most promising pianist; indeed she played this difficult movement so well that one would like to hear her in the complete work. Another good performance was given by Miss Doris Vevers in Lalo's 'Cello Concerto in D minor. A striking number in the programme was the closing scene from 'Götterdämmerung,' sung by Miss Irene Morden, who has a fine voice and sang with real dramatic expression. She is a pupil of Mr. Thomas Meux, a well-known Wagnerian singer during the Richter régime.

The following day, March 21, the students' chamber concert was given in the Duke's Hall. Good intelligent playing was heard by a male string quartet in the first and last movements of Mozart's Quartet in G. Miss Dorothy Haigh sang two Brahms Lieder, in which she realised the Lieder style, and furthermore her German was exceptionally good. This is the student who gained the Blackpool Competition Scholarship a couple of years ago. Four songs composed by Miss Elizabeth Poston, and accompanied by the composer, were well sung by Miss May Turtle, a Belfast girl. Two of them, 'Sweet Suffolk Owl' and 'In youth is pleasure,' are prettily written in olden fashion.

A highly successful 'Review Week' came to an end on Saturday, March 23, with a choral concert in the Duke's Hall. The best performance of the afternoon was Pergolesi's 'Stabat Mater,' for female voices, strings, and organ. Miss Valetta Iacopi sang the contralto solos very well indeed. Mr. Ernest Read conducted. In the interval Sir Thomas Beecham addressed the audience, and in a characteristically clever speech pointed out the desirability of a permanent opera in London. He offered every student securing three subscribers to his scheme a free membership of the Imperial League of Opera, and all the resultant benefits therefrom. It is the manifest duty of every student to canvass enthusiastically, both for their own good and the good of this admirable cause. F.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC

The last fortnight of the Easter term provided an interesting series of concerts, recitals, and opera performances. The most successful of the recitals were given by Mr. Kennedy McKenna, Miss Barbara Pulvermacher, Miss Millicent Silver, and Miss Geraldine Peck. The Second Orchestra provided a new feature in its concerts by giving one for strings only, the most conspicuous items being Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso and Parry's 'English' Suite. The concert of the Third Orchestra produced no less than twelve students as conductors, who directed Purcell's 'Gordian Knot' Suite, Bach's D major Suite, and Beethoven's eighth Symphony, in addition to an Overture and a violin solo.

These fixtures, though commendable achievements as part of the term's work, were naturally somewhat overshadowed by the success of a very considerable undertaking of unusual distinction, namely, the first production of a new opera by R. Vaughan Williams, 'Sir John in Love.' Four performances were given, with varying casts, the first being on March 21, and it is pleasant to record that the smoothness of the production, which entailed a vast amount of work both on the stage and in the orchestra, received general commendation, reflecting great credit on the conductor, Dr. Malcolm Sargent, the producer, Mr. Cairns James, and Mr. Procter Gregg, who had designed the scenery. The event attracted the closest attention of all interested in the problem of the development of English opera, and as a further example of the fine work done by the Ernest Palmer Opera Study Fund, proved once more the foresight of its generous founder.

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC

The College has sustained a further loss by the death of the late Dr. J. C. Bridge, who held the post of Chairman of the Board and Director of Studies for the last four years. His health had given great anxiety from the end of 1928, when he was compelled to take leave of absence. He gradually lost strength, and passed away on Good Friday. At his funeral the College was largely represented. Mr. d'Evry and Mr. E. Stanley Roper assisted in officiating at the organ.

The annual general meeting of the College was held on March 22, Mr. W. W. Cobbett presiding. The balance sheet and report showed the satisfactory state of the College.

Drs. Creser and C. Vincent, old and valued servants of the College, together with the Rev. Michael Kelly, were elected Vice-Presidents. Dr. J. Warriner was elected Chairman of the Corporation, Mr. Cobbett, who was warmly thanked for his past services, having expressed his wish not to take office again. Mr. Llewelyn Howell was elected Vice-Chairman.

Mr. E. d'Evry has been appointed Controller of Examinations, and Mr. E. Stanley Roper has been appointed Principal.

The examination work in India necessitates a second examiner being sent. Further, Mr. A. Watson will go to South Africa as a special Examiner in Elocution.

The terminal orchestral concert at Queen's Hall, on Saturday, April 6, was well attended by an enthusiastic audience; the soloists, G. A. S. Bone (pianoforte), G. M. Parker (violin), and Sylvia Pickering (vocalist), were particularly well applauded. The orchestral items included the Sullivan Overture 'In Memoriam,' played as a token of respect to the memory of the late Principal of the College, Prof. J. C. Bridge.

The Grotrian Hall chamber concert, on April 3, was a great success.

As a result of a competition recently held, Bernard C. Gee and Herbert Davis were awarded scholarships in singing, tenable at the College. The adjudicators were Mr. Alec Rowley, Mrs. H. Trust, Mr. E. Stanley Roper, Mr. Edward d'Evry, and Dr. John Warriner.

The Grosvenor Gooch Prizes for the term just ended have been awarded to Sylvia Pickering and Charles Sealey.

MUSIC IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS

BRUTON (King's School).—Charles Wood's 'The Passion according to St. Mark' was given on Good Friday, and a miscellaneous programme, including Mozart's Symphony in G minor, on Easter Sunday. Mr. N. W. Newell conducted. Mr. Newell has also given a series of lecture-recitals on 'The Historical Development of Music.'

CANFORD.—On January 31 a song recital was given by Mr. Steuart Wilson. There have also been concerts of chamber music, and lectures.

DENSTONE.—A series of Sunday concerts was given during the Easter term, consisting of an organ recital, a pianoforte recital, a song recital, and a programme of chamber music. The works given included Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto (the organ playing the orchestral part), Franck's Violin Sonata, and Holst's 'Jupiter,' from the 'Planets' (pianoforte duet).——The Passion Music from 'The Messiah' was sung on Good Friday by the School Choral Society, and on Easter Day the choir sang S. S. Wesley's 'Blessed be the God and Father.'——The House Competition took place on March 21, and was judged by Mr. D. G. A. Fox, of Bradfield College.

DOVER.—Three recitals of music for violin, orchestra, choir, and organ have been given in the Chapel under the direction of Mr. R. B. Hurry. Among the items were Bach's 'Jesu, Joy of man's desiring' and 'Zion hears her watchmen's voices'; the slow movement from the Concerto for two violins in D minor, a Canzona by Purcell for two violins, and Walford Davies's 'Solemn Melody.'

ETON.—Stanford's 'The Revenge' was the principal item at the School concert. The orchestra played Boyce's Symphony in D, Elgar's second 'Pomp and Circumstance' March, and Robin Milford's Gavotte for oboe and strings. Four organ recitals have been given by Dr. Ley, a harpsichord recital by Mrs. Gordon Woodhouse, and a concert by the 2nd Battalion of the K.R.R.C. 'St. Paul' and selections from the 'St. Matthew' Passion have been sung by the Windsor and Eton Choral Society, and Charles Wood's 'The Passion according to St. Mark' was given on Good Friday. A recital on Easter Day included Vaughan Williams's Five Mystical Songs, sung by Mr. H. Haworth and the College choir.

HARPENDEN (St. George's).—On February 21 a Coleridge-Taylor concert was given under the direction of Mr. Denis Wright. 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast' was sung, and the 'Petite Suite de Concert' played. Dr. Tom Goodey was the soloist.

STAMFORD.—At the end-of-term concert Stanford's 'Phaudrig Crohoore' and movements from Parry's

'Lady Radnor's Suite' were the principal items, the rest of the programme being miscellaneous. Mr. H. Brook conducted.

SUTTON VALENCE.—On Easter Sunday a concert was given by the Choral Society assisted by members of the Maidstone Amateur Orchestral Society. The programme included four movements from Mozart's 'Requiem,' chorales and solos by Bach, and violin solos played by Mr. J. A. Robinson, of the L.S.O. Mr. S. L. L. Russell conducted.

WELLINGTON.—Recitals have been given by Mr. Plunket Greene, the Elizabethan Singers, the Hungarian String Quartet, and Mr. Loris Blofield (violin), the two latter with Mr. W. K. Stanton at the pianoforte. The music competitions were judged by Dr. George Dyson, one of the pianists under fifteen and a half playing Franck's Prelude, Choral, and Fugue. A substantial part of the B minor Mass was given on March 28, and the programme of an orchestral concert contained the Brahms-Haydn Variations, movements from Mozart's Symphonies in G minor and C, and two shanties sung with orchestral accompaniment.

WESTMINSTER.—At the Madrigal and Orchestral Societies' concert the orchestra played two movements from the fifth Symphony of Beethoven, Delius's 'First Cuckoo,' and the second 'Brandenburg' Concerto of Bach, also accompanying Mr. H. Meyer (O.W.) in two movements of the Mozart Concerto for violin, in D. In the Bach Concerto the trumpet and violin solos were played by boys in the school. The choral items consisted of two of Holst's 'Hymns from the Rig-Veda,' madrigals, and part-songs. The informal concert contained solos for flute, violin, clarinet, and horn, as well as pianoforte solos and duets; and a 'cellist played a movement from the Mendelssohn Concerto in D. During the term, moreover, detachments of the school have attended the Orchestral Concerts for Children given in Central Hall, Westminster, and conducted by Dr. Malcolm Sargent.

WEYMOUTH.—On Good Friday Charles Wood's 'The Passion according to St. Mark' was sung under the direction of Mr. J. G. Hall. F. H. S.

THE B.N.O.C. in VERDI'S 'FALSTAFF'

The performance of Verdi's 'Falstaff' at Golders Green Hippodrome—not quite perfect artistically—was nevertheless a success for the company and an evening of enjoyment for the audience. It is interesting to note how the public is gradually 'taking' to 'Falstaff.' It was one of the sorrows of the composer's last days to see the public who had been so faithful to him turning away from his last opera. It is a pity he did not live to see it taking its rightful place in the repertory—which is what is now happening.

The B.N.O.C. performance was chiefly remarkable for the impersonation of the title-rôle by Mr. Arthur Fear, who was but a year or two ago still a student of the Royal Academy of Music. He is an artist of whom we expect much. At present he still lacks experience, but once or twice on the concert-platform and in the performances of 'Falstaff' with his fellow students at the Scala Theatre, and again with the B.N.O.C., he has shown very uncommon resources. His voice has a timbre which immediately arrests attention. He has no need to stress emphasis or expression marks. The quality of the tone seems to fit naturally and inevitably the composer's thought. If his development fulfils the promise of these first performances he must go far.

Otherwise the performance had a certain finish and neatness but lacked elasticity and perfect proportions. The ensemble was accurate, but wanting in charm and spontaneity. These things, no doubt, will come when the company is more familiar with the work, and the exuberance of the orchestra—which was conducted by Mr. John Barbirolli—has been toned down somewhat. Apart from these not very serious reservations, the opera went with a swing, and the full house acclaimed with warmth and gratitude all concerned. F. B.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS'S 'SIR JOHN IN LOVE'

Vaughan Williams's new opera 'Sir John in Love' resembles, in method, his first work for the theatre, 'Hugh the Drover.' The principle on which the whole structure rests is the same—English folk-song applied to an essentially English theme. There is also the same mastery of treatment, distinction of style, the same skilful touch, and the same charm. Yet, while 'Hugh the Drover' met with nothing but praise, 'Sir John in Love' found a warm but more critical welcome in which praise was qualified with reservations.

No doubt a hundred different reasons will be given to explain the phenomenon, but I believe that one of the chief causes was in the choice of a subject which made comparisons inevitable. Vaughan Williams had every right to choose Falstaff as his hero, but there are occasions when it is wise not to enforce a right. A composer more versed or concerned with the psychology of the public would have hesitated to enter a field where comparisons became inevitable. Of course, the public has no business to make them. If we accept without demur a hundred presentations of the same subject from a hundred different painters, why should we boggle at two composers treating the same theme? But the public is a law unto itself, and will not resign its claims because they happen to be unreasonable. And considering that Verdi's 'Falstaff' is just now coming into favour, it is much to Vaughan Williams's credit that certain scenes—especially the Basket Scene—stand the comparison well. But it is not by comparing two such composers as Verdi and Vaughan Williams—dissimilar in temperament, upbringing, tradition, outlook—that we can form an idea of their worth.

The important point which must be established is that in 'Sir John in Love,' Vaughan Williams has given us some of his loveliest music—too beautiful sometimes for situations requiring nothing but deftness and delicate artifice. His arrangement of 'Greensleeves' is so ravishing as to be more fitting for a duet between Romeo and Juliet than Alice Ford and Falstaff; Dr. Caius—a caricature—at the mention of Anne Page becomes a 'palmer in love's eye.' These matters, however, do not impair our enjoyment—if we can get rid of the idea that opera must conform to one of three or four known models. The faults of 'Sir John in Love' are those of style which has not been fully tested—its merits, unconventionality and freshness.

Folk-songs cannot be regarded as a panacea that must cure all our ills. But it cannot be denied that Vaughan Williams himself has never presented folk-tunes more graciously or embroidered them more ably than in his latest opera. Its real weakness is in the text crowded with too many pictures, some of which are perfectly irrelevant to the main plot. The composer can plead that these are all found in the Shakespearean comedy, and that there they do not impede the pace of the action. That is so; but music not only tends to expand a scene or an episode; it sharpens the lines of demarcation. In the comedy the duel between Dr. Caius and Sir Hugh Evans may seem pertinent enough; in the opera it becomes detached and unrelated.

The performance, which Dr. Malcolm Sargent conducted, was a credit to all concerned—students of the R.C.M., who revealed aptitude, good training, and the zest of true musicians. F. B.

London Concerts

ROYAL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY

The season ended with two concerts of unusual interest. That of March 21 gave us some of the finest playing heard in London for many a long day. Sir Thomas Beecham had what might fairly be called an evening out with his three 'specials'—Berlioz ('The Royal Hunt' and 'Storm in the Forest,' from 'The Trojans'), Mozart (Symphony in C, K.425), and Delius ('Appalachia'). A better performance of the Berlioz need not be asked for. If 'Appalachia' still failed to satisfy, the fault was not in the performance. The piece goes on far too long. We could well spare some of the earlier Variations, in which the composer does little more with the rather poor theme than plaster it with ever juicier chords. A feeling of monotony creeps in long before the end.

'Appalachia' gave us an opportunity of hearing the London Select Choir (conductor, Mr. T. Arnold Fulton). This is an excellent, well-trained body; we wished they had had more to do in this programme. Hence a question: When a choir is brought in to take a small part in a big work, why should it not be heard alone as well? A group of unaccompanied madrigals or part-songs would have provided the best of relief after (say) the Berlioz, and would have been fairer treatment for the singers and their skilful trainer. (By the way, it is a pity the choir stood for its contribution in 'Appalachia.' The voices are merely part of the orchestral score. The sudden rising of a body of singers in the course of an orchestral work tends to make it into a choral item with orchestral accompaniment.) M. Cortot was, as usual, at his best in the Franck Symphonic Variations.

Sir Thomas Beecham's conducting has developed quite as far as it can safely go (farther, perhaps) in the direction of the ballet. Are all those actions, those pirouettings and grimacings, necessary? It may be argued that if they give us such fine playing they justify themselves. The answer to this is a further question: Does he conduct better now than in his less physically exuberant days? We doubt it. And if the reader says that those who find such methods distracting should look elsewhere, we reply that it is hardly less of a nuisance to be compelled to close our eyes or to take care that they avoid the gesticulating figure in the rostrum.

On April 18, Sir Henry Wood conducted a capital performance of a mixed and highly-coloured scheme. The outstanding works were Bloch's Symphony 'Israel' and Sibelius's 'Tapiola,' both of which were heard for the first time at these concerts. They are works of genuine originality, and if the Finn proved to be rather a better composer than the cosmopolitan Hebrew, it was mainly because he was often content to suggest rather than to state fully, still less to underline. But 'Israel,' with its passionate—even vociferous—protestations and its beautiful ending (in which a quartet of women's voices and a baritone soloist play an important part) made a great impression. It should be heard again soon, and followed at not too long an interval by the composer's 'America.'

Apropos of the vocal quartet, we hope we shall not be misunderstood if we say that we wished the four ladies who sang so excellently had been out of sight. Bloch directs that the singers shall be merely a part of the orchestra; but these ladies sat in the front of the platform, stood to sing, and took several calls at the end, for all the world as if the work we had just heard (and in which their share took about three minutes) was one for four singers with orchestral background. How much greater the effect would have been had they been less obtrusively placed was shown by the thrill produced by Mr. Keith Falkner's little bit of solo work, sung from some invisible spot. Mr. Falkner was also heard to splendid advantage in the highly descriptive and dramatic recitative and aria from Bach's Cantata No. 70.

B.B.C. VERDI'S 'REQUIEM'

Instead of 'Parsifal' on Good Friday the B.B.C. gave Verdi's 'Requiem.' An Italian conductor had originally been promised, but it was Sir Henry Wood who conducted what was, taken all round, a capital performance. For Sir Henry Wood excels in the use of broad effects, and is temperamentally warm-blooded enough to be in sympathy with a great work which, despite its greatness, does not appeal equally to the pictorially-minded and the philosophically-minded. English choruses are more used to the reflective type of music, but the change to this frank and obvious style did the B.B.C. chorus a lot of good. Their tone is good, but experience is lacking, so that there has been some diffidence in their singing. In the 'Requiem' they achieved greater freedom and happiness than in anything they have hitherto done; the eight-part 'Sanctus' was particularly well sung. The 'Dies Iræ,' with its magnificent battery of brass, was likewise a fine piece of work on everyone's part. The 'Libera me' fugue, however, was taken too fast to get its right stride.

The soloists individually were reasonably good, but they did not sing as a quartet, and that is essential for a first-class performance. Miss Miriam Licette's singing was sweet but erratic; Miss Brunskill sang (as usual) with power and conviction; Mr. Walter Widdop's robust phrases and high notes were valuable, but he made no attempt to sing with expression in softer passages or to modify his solo style to ensemble work; Mr. Harold Williams alone realised to the full the value of light and shade even in a work whose effects are for the most part broadly conceived. While, therefore, in detail the performance cannot be said to have been ideal, it was more than adequate to show the splendour of the work and to give great pleasure to the listener.

F. H.

THE GLASGOW ORPHEUS CHOIR

It is a pleasure to hear such choral singing as the Glasgow Orpheus Choir brings to London once a year at Easter-time, because, although it is to some extent open to the criticism which is brought against the 'crack' Northern choirs whose laurels are won more often in the competition arena than in the concert hall, it does keep before it the ideal of making music as perfectly as possible. Its programmes on April 13 were certainly not as good as they ought to be, and if a large proportion of really great music and fewer arrangements were included, the choir's own ideal would more easily be realised. For they fall too readily into sentimentality. Scottish folk-songs are sentimental; all the more need, therefore, not to treat things like Stanford's 'Heraclitus' in a sentimental manner. Verbal point-making is not out of place in madrigal singing, and it would have been good to have had more madrigals sung as pointedly as 'Sweet honey-sucking bees.'

There is no need to praise the virtuosity of the choir (Bantock's arrangement of the Hebridean 'Death Croon' was an example of what it can do in this line), nor Mr. Hugh Roberton's powers of inspiring the finished execution of his carefully thought-out interpretations. But a rather broader vision would save an admirable choir from all suspicion of 'stunting.' Some Scottish folk-songs were sung as solos by individual members of the choir in a competent and acceptable manner.

THE PHILHARMONIC CHOIR

The concert of the Philharmonic Choir given at Queen's Hall on March 26 showed the excellent work which is being done by the junior choir of young women under Mr. C. Kennedy Scott's direction. The juniors sang Schubert's 'The Lord is my Shepherd' and Holst's fine but difficult 'Hecuba's Lament' (solo contralto, Miss Mary Morris), and made it evident, both by their quality of tone and their musical intelligence, that the senior choir need never lack good recruits for its upper parts.

The senior choir (with Miss Elsie Suddaby, Mr. Percy Manchester, and Mr. Howard Fry as soloists) sang Schubert's Mass in G, Brahms's two unaccompanied Motets 'Wherefore now hath life' and 'O rend the Heavens' (Op. 74), and the 'Song of Destiny' with the London Symphony Orchestra. Of these things the most interesting were the Motets, for even though they may be regarded rather as an essay in Bach's style than as spontaneous Brahms, they are extraordinarily fine specimens of a rich choral texture, are rarely heard, and were splendidly sung by the Philharmonic Choir.

THE BACH CHOIR

On March 16 the Bach Choir, under the direction of Dr. Adrian Boult, gave a programme of Schubert's music in the Central Hall, Westminster. Its chief event was the Mass in A flat. This was preceded by an orchestral arrangement made by Mr. Gordon Jacob of the Funeral March for the Tsar Alexander I. and the 'Tantum Ergo' in E flat for vocal quartet and orchestra. The solo singers were a quartet from the Royal College of Music (Miss Mabel Ritchie, Miss B. de la Porte, Mr. Emlyn Bebb, and Mr. Richard Watson), who had the advantage of having studied together. They, however, had the disadvantage of singing like a chamber music party. They were apt to be overwhelmed by the orchestra. The Mass in A flat adds to Schubert's constant sense of beauty certain moments, particularly in the Creed and Sanctus, of outstanding magnificence. The choir sang it with evident understanding of its mood and flexibility of expression, even though the balance of tone was not entirely satisfactory. X.

R.A.M. CHOIR

The singing of the choir at the Royal Academy of Music showed no serious flaw at any point. If one felt that the performance (especially in the Mass of Palestrina) did not quite come up to expectations, it must be frankly admitted that the extraordinary high standard of some performances of the R.A.M. students in the past has led one to expect more than one has any right to do. The tone was occasionally ragged; there was a certain disproportion in the 'weight' of the parts; there was now and again a hint of restlessness and even anxiety which was not favourable to the music. Much more satisfactory in every way was the performance of Julius Harrison's 'Blessed Damozel,' in which the conductor's tempi seemed perfect and the tone of the women's voices blended with fine effect. Pergolesi's 'Stabat Mater' made up the second part of a very enjoyable concert. F. B.

THE BACH CANTATA CLUB

A lecture-recital was a valuable innovation in the activities of the Bach Cantata Club at St. Margaret's, Westminster, on March 19, when Prof. Sanford Terry gave an address on 'The Church Chorale in Bach's Usage,' illustrated by the choir of the Bach Cantata Club under Mr. C. Kennedy Scott.

Prof. Terry's main theme was that Bach's whole attitude to music was coloured by his profound religious beliefs, which found their clearest exposition in the numerous chorales scattered through his works. It was however a fact, that though Bach was an orthodox Lutheran, he had great sympathies with the warmth and sincerity of Pietism. It was this that induced him to co-operate with Schemelli in the Geistliche Lieder. A more doubtful contention was that Bach was unusually sensitive to the words of the hymns. Though the 'Choralvorspiele' have been shown by Schweitzer and others to owe their character and inspiration to verbal details of the text, there remain to be set on the other side the many puzzling examples of reckless borrowing from all the choral works from the B minor Mass downwards which betray an almost shocking *in*sensitiveness to words.

The illustrations which showed seven types of chorale to be found in Bach were admirably sung, with a flexibility worthy of madrigal-singing. F. H.

THE ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY

As usual, the Royal Choral Society gave a performance of 'The Messiah' on Good Friday. It had some of the usual faults and some unusual virtues. The former were due to the soloists, who, as a class, seem quite unable to sing Handelian recitative; the latter were due to Sir Hugh Allen, who rather unexpectedly took the choruses much more lightly than is his usual way of proceeding. He did not follow the fashion of quick tempi, but neither did he allow the slovenly drawling of the bad old tradition. In the earlier part of the work he exacted careful detail in the orchestral playing, so that 'For behold, darkness,' sung with just enough and not too much dramatic feeling by Mr. Horace Stevens, was more than usually impressive. But in the second part, perhaps discouraged by the mixture of styles and the bad taste of the soloists, he allowed it to become ragged.

Mr. Heddle Nash thought an Italian operatic style, with imitation catches in the voice, suitable to oratorio, and Miss Flora Woodman made the same kind of mistake and sang out of tune. Miss Brunskill is incapable of faults of this kind, but even she drawls her recitatives. The Royal Choral Society as a body has now renounced its mechanical treatment of 'The Messiah,' but it has not yet solved the problem of presenting the work in a homogeneous manner with adequate and like-minded soloists. B.B.C. CHAMBER CONCERT

The last of the B.B.C. Chamber Concerts, held at the Arts Theatre Club on April 3, presented an admirable opportunity of studying the work of a Czech composer of distinct talent and originality. With the music of Central Europe in its present state, something out of the ordinary is doubly welcome.

Boleslav Martinu's second String Quartet was already familiar to those in the audience who attended the Siena Festival last summer, and there must have been some who, like the present writer, were grateful for this chance of hearing for a second time a work which had remained in the memory as one of the more striking compositions heard at the Festival. As is to be expected from a composer inspired to write an orchestral work in celebration of Rugby football—'Half-Time' was played some years ago at one of the International Festivals—the Quartet exudes Zeitgeist in every bar. The work contains a good deal of what may be termed modern musical journalese, such as the insistently repeated rhythms and trite little pseudo-folk-tunes which are the maggots of most Slav composers and their followers; but these mannerisms do not conceal the thought behind the music. It is vigorous music, full of feeling for line and the development of themes. The slow movement in particular has points of beauty which raise Martinu above the level of other composers east of the Rhine.

Paul Hindemith, who seems to be the Peter Pan of modern German music, was represented in the programme by his Sonata for unaccompanied viola, played by himself with considerable skill, and his fourth String Quartet. The Sonata opens with a brisk, interesting movement, but the interest is not sustained throughout, and the work becomes rather a strain on the listener's patience. The unaccompanied sonata is a curious phenomenon at the best of times, and taxes a composer's invention to the utmost, but surely the first rule should be to confine its length to fifteen minutes at the outside.

Hindemith's Quartet suffers from the same complaint. When the music is quick, as in the charming 'Little March,' it is entertaining and witty, its contrapuntal skill is instinctive, and we are convinced that the composer has something to say; but when it is 'slow but flowing' (wouldn't it be better to have Italian equivalents for these German phrases, instead of literal English translations?) the invention flags, and we tire of listening to 'horizontal' music. After lying, musically, on our backs for some time, it would be a relief to sit up and be 'vertical' for a change. In all Hindemith's music it is this want of harmonic interest which makes the slow movements so uninteresting.

The Amar-Hindemith Quartet, as usual, were excellent in their precise playing of this work and Martinu's Quartet.

Miss Marcelle Meyer contributed two pianoforte items—Stravinsky's Serenade in A major, and a Sonata in three movements by Nikolas Nabokoff. The Serenade is an example of Stravinsky at his least effective—and it is rarely, however poor the ingredients, that he fails to serve at least the semblance of a lordly dish. Nabokoff's Sonata is probably the most irritating piece of music heard in London for some years. The obvious salon atmosphere of the slow movement shows where the composer's talents lie. P. C. H.

BRITISH MUSIC SOCIETY

The London Contemporary Music and Marylebone centres of the British Music Society gave a joint chamber concert at the Court House on March 18. One was grateful to them for the engagement of the Société Taffanel of Paris, the excellent quintet of wind-players named after the famous flautist and until recently headed by that no less distinguished exponent of the same instrument, the late Louis Fleury, who created an extraordinary revival of interest in concerted wind-music, both among listeners and composers. The association now consists of M. René Le Roy (flute), M. Louis Bas (oboe), M. Achille Grass (clarinet), M. Edouard Hénon (bassoon), and M. Jules Vialet (horn).

The programme opened with Mozart's endearing Quintet for wind and pianoforte, with Mr. Erwin Schulhoff at the keyboard. It was bold and honest to start with a work so familiar that one was at once left free to focus attention upon the playing, and it was seen at the end of the evening that the judgment formed at the end of the Quintet could have been quite justly made public without any further hearing. There was, in the classical work as in the modern pieces heard later, great vitality and charm of phrasing, the utmost nicety in the choice of pace and dynamics, and, above all, capital team work to be noted in favour of the Société Taffanel; on the other hand, the tone of flute and clarinet alone was found quite satisfying; both oboe and bassoon one thought a little coarse, and the horn showed now and again a curious hankering after the maudlin delivery of the saxophone. But this is scoring points for and against, a process that calls for the striking of a balance, which, when all is said, can only be highly favourable to these players.

The most engaging of the three modern works was Vincent d'Indy's 'Chansons et Danses' for five wind instruments. A masterly technique is here used with so much ease that the hearer is never conscious of it, and finds it hard to believe that the composer was aware of applying it. Thus, for all his ingenuity of treatment, d'Indy finds it possible to revel in things of the open air and share whole-heartedly in the naïve pleasures of country people. He is like a schoolmaster making the best of a holiday: his cultivated mind cannot help reflecting on the experience, but his easy and gracious discourse is perfectly free from pedantry. His originality, moreover, is startling. The music never sounds even remotely like any other composer's.

Albert Roussel's 'Divertissement' for the same instruments with pianoforte also has a rural feeling about it, but although his handling is much freer and more impressionistic than d'Indy's solid technique, the effect is less natural. Roussel's rusticity resembles in all but idiom that of the 18th century; it is a temporary affectation of culture, not the expression of any real love of the country. But it is a very pretty affectation, and although this is an early and scarcely representative work of Roussel's, it gives pleasure by its deft handling of tone-colour and dynamics.

The 'Rapsodie' by Joseph Jongen, also for wind and pianoforte, was found flippant in material and tedious in treatment. One was constrained to seek some entertainment in speculating whether the composer had sought to alleviate his heavy manner by an excessive lightness of matter, or endeavoured to make up by a profound discourse for the triviality of his theme—and even the mild pleasure of conjecture was spoilt by undue protraction. About half-way through the work, when every moment one expected it to be reaching the end, one found nothing more for the mind to do but to wonder if one had ever come across another musical work before that found it too difficult to come to any conclusion.

Madame Soffi Schönning, of the Royal Opera at Stockholm, sang two groups of songs. She has almost every gift that makes successful singers save that of rhythmic vitality: a superb soprano voice, an admirable technique, a sympathetic personality, and an attractive presence. Arias by Gluck and Alessandro Scarlatti were done in a broad, aloof style, and there was a complete change to a winning intimacy for the Scandinavian and Finnish group that came later. Two songs by Backer-Lunde were prettily insipid, and one by Palmgren had a quiet charm; all three were modern only in the chronological sense of the term. E. B.

ALTRA STRING QUARTET

Apart from occasional imperfection in the leader's intonation, the readings of the Altra Quartet at Wigmore Hall showed a good grasp of the principles on which excellence in the playing of chamber music rests. I am inclined to think that these ladies over-rate the importance of a robust tone. Volume, sonority, fullness can sometimes decide the fortunes of the day. But there are moments in the music of all composers when the 'gentler gamester is the surest winner.' Especially in Haydn one missed some of his courtly elegance, of the essential refinement of his idiom.

The most completely satisfactory performance of the Altra Quartet was in a work by Edric Cundell—straightforward, but pleasing and well-written music. F. B.

MAX MEYER'S SONGS

Mr. Max Meyer, of Manchester, is a musician in the German tradition. The concert of his songs given at Grotrian Hall on March 22 showed that he has the genuine musical impulse and the adequate technique which are honourable characteristics of that tradition. But the total impression of a programme which included settings of German, English, French, and Anglo-Celtic words was that his melody is not quite strong enough nor its cut quite personal enough to bear the weight of the song. His accompaniments did a good deal to conceal the defect by creating the atmosphere in a few deft strokes, but, generally speaking, the more ambitious the song (such as those in the 'Mæve' cycle of Eva Gore-Booth) the less satisfactory the impression, for the vocal line in trying to be faithful to the words hovers uncertainly between melody and declamation. In short lyrics such as 'Departure' (Eva Gore-Booth), 'The Song of Brother Giles' (Laurence Housman), and 'Raindrops' (Mary Coleridge), on the other hand, the balance of thought, melody, and apt accompaniment is happily struck. In 'Insouciance,' however, one of those fragile Chinese poems which need treating as lightly as a soap-bubble, the effect was ruined by the repetition of the last sentence. Miss Constance Felpts (contralto) and Mr. Dale Smith (baritone) served the composer well by the versatility and fidelity of their interpretations. F. H.

Music in the Suburbs

During the period under review the majority of choral societies were concentrating on 'The Messiah.' Among the exceptions were four societies that gave concerts on March 21, a week before Easter. Bromley Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Frederick Fertel, chose Brahms's 'Requiem' and an abridged version of 'Solomon'; an Irish concert was given by the Catford Choral Society, with a miscellaneous programme that included a speech in praise of Ireland by the conductor, Mr. A. M. Gifford (the same Society was to do 'Jephtha' on April 18); 'Semele' and 'The Banner of St. George' were given by West Middlesex Musical Society under Mr. C. Stanley Smallman; and Streatham Choral Society, conducted by Mr. F. Hulbert Belton, performed 'The Dream of Gerontius' at St. Leonard's Church.

At the last of the Bromley Orchestral concerts, Mr. W. H. Reed conducted Beethoven's fifth Symphony, Franck's 'Le Chasseur maudit,' and two of Debussy's Nocturnes.

Sharps and Flats

If we lived in the Golden Age instead of in the Internal-Combustion Age I have no doubt that many of us would indulge ourselves in art for art's sake; but living, as we do, at a time when the struggle to exist in moderate comfort is becoming increasingly difficult, the artist who pretends that he is not trying to turn his talent into cash is an impudent jackass.—Compton Mackenzie.

Nothing is the matter with my voice; my salary is satisfactory; and I am not in love; but I am never going to sing again. I want to rest on a farm.—Marian Talley.

Lovers of good music are paying another visit to the Grand Theatre this week to see again 'Lilac Time' and hear Schubert's tripping, haunting, dearly familiar melodies come over the footlights with all their wonted fragrance and unfailing freshness. Amongst the songs included in the play are 'Hark, hark, the lark' and the 'Unfinished' Symphony.—Blackpool Gazette.

The tone-poem 'Finlandia' was the item of the evening. The conductor knows Sibelius well, and he brought out each movement with a great delicacy and charm. The piece is fascinating, and although the timpani player lost the triangle, it was equally as absorbing as when played at the Town Hall.—Ilford Recorder.

The days of 'My mother bids me bind my hair,' 'Where'er you walk,' &c., are long since dead, and I hope buried, when we have such wonderful English composers of really beautiful ballads, to name only three: Landon Ronald, Herbert Oliver, and Haydn Wood. Could there be anything more lovely than 'Down in the Forest,' 'Songs of Old London,' and 'Oh Flower Divine'?—W. A. Jackson (professional singer).

What a magnificent writer of 'talkie' operas Wagner would have made! If he had only known what Al Jonson knows!—Leslie Heward.

English music is hopelessly sterile. What does it amount to to-day?—Gordon Beckles.

I have created the impression of being an embittered critic. . . . Perhaps this is so. . . .—Gordon Beckles.

. . . the interminable repetitions of the slow movement of Mozart's E flat Symphony; towards the end I always feel that if Mozart says just once more what he has said so many times already, I shall break down and sob hysterically on the shoulder of the lady sitting in front of me.—Ernest Newman.

I never intend to leave the concert-platform until my presence on the stage is a signal for everybody to walk out. I do not intend to retire until the public refuses to hear me sing any more.—John McCormack.

When I go to the opera my brain takes a holiday. . . . I detest the pedants who dissect and vivisect my music, or my musical emotions. They are parasites in my paradise. Let me alone, I murmur. . . .—James Douglas.

Music in the Provinces

BARNSLEY.—The St. Cecilia Society performed 'Samson' on March 28 under Dr. J. Frederic Staton, the solo parts being sung by Miss Emily Crowther, Miss Gertrude Gilpin, Mr. Edward Humphreys, and Mr. Albert Murgatroyd.

BATH.—Sir Thomas Beecham conducted the Pump Room Orchestra at the Palace Theatre on March 19 in Debussy's 'Petite Suite,' a C major Symphony by Mozart, and the 'Siegfried Idyll.'——On the following evening at the Pump Room, Mr. John Roberts and Mr. Percy Auty played the Beethoven Violin and 'Cello Concerto under Mr. Jan Hurst's conductorship.

BEDFORD.—The Bedford Musical Society gave Brahms's 'Requiem' at the Corn Exchange on March 20, under the direction of Mr. H. J. Colson. The principal singers were Miss Hilda Howe and Mr. Keith Falkner, whose group of songs included Stanford's 'To the Soul' (Walt Whitman) and Vaughan Williams's 'The Call.' The concert ended with Balfour Gardiner's evening hymn, 'Thee, Lord, before the close of day.'

BIRMINGHAM.—Mr. G. D. Cunningham, back from his tour in the United States, conducted the City of Birmingham Choir on March 21 in Verdi's 'Requiem' and, with Miss Constance Willis, Brahms's Alto Rhapsody. The choir had been trained by Mr. F. W. North.——The music played by the City Orchestra on March 17 had been chosen by a previous audience. It included the 'Magic Flute' Overture, the fifth Symphony, Mozart's Serenade in G, and the 'Siegfried Idyll.'——On March 21 Dr. Boult conducted the City Orchestra and the Festival Choral Society in the Choral Symphony.——At the last Sunday concert of the season, conducted by Dr. Boult, Mr. Ruggero Terlin played a Haydn Concerto on the harpsichord.——Mr. Paul Beard joined the Catterall Quartet on March 18 in Brahms's Quintet in G.——The second 'Razoumovsky' was played by the Philharmonic String Quartet a week later.

BOLTON.—At its third and last concert of the season the Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. Charles Risegari, gave a performance of Eric Fogg's 'The Hillside.'——The Choral Union, conducted by Mr. Thomas Booth, gave 'Acis and Galatea' on March 20. The Polyphemus was Mr. Horace Stevens.

BOURNEMOUTH.—At the Winter Gardens on March 13 Bach's 'St. John' Passion was sung by the Municipal Choir under Sir Dan Godfrey. The principal singers were Miss Bella Baillie, Mr. Hubert Eisdell, Mr. Owen Bryngwyn, and Mr. Edward Warburton.——The first Symphony Concert in the new Pavilion took place on March 21. The chief work in the programme was Vaughan Williams's 'London' Symphony, conducted by Sir Dan Godfrey.

BRADFORD.—The Festival Choral Society, assisted by the Bradford Permanent Orchestra, gave 'The Song of Hiawatha,' under Dr. Malcolm Sargent.——Dr. Sargent also conducted the orchestra on March 23 in Brahms's fourth Symphony and his own 'Impressions on a Breezy Day.'——At the last of the Philharmonic Sunday Concerts Mr. Keith Douglas announced that there were nearly four hundred subscribers, and that he hoped to raise this figure to six hundred for next season. Brahms's Violin Concerto was played by Mr. Catterall.

BRIGHTON.—A Tchaikovsky-Elgar programme was given under Mr. Herbert Menges at the Dome on March 23. The Elgar items were the 'Froissart' Overture, the Andante from the 'Serenade for Strings,' and the first 'Pomp and Circumstance' March. Mr. Solomon played Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Concerto.

BRISTOL.—Sir Thomas Beecham being unable to conduct the performance of Bach's Mass in B minor by the Choral Society on March 16, his place was taken by Mr. Arthur Sims, the conductor of the Newport Choral Society, a hundred of whose singers were assisting. Miss Dora Labbette, Miss Margaret Balfour, Mr. Steuart Wilson, and Mr. Robert Easton were the soloists.——The Philharmonic Society concluded its season a week later with 'The Apostles,' conducted by Mr. Arnold Barter. The principal parts were sung by Miss Bella Baillie, Miss Muriel Brunskill, Mr. Archibald Winter, Mr. Frank Phillips, Mr. Howard Fry, and Mr. Roy Henderson.——The Dayton Choir (Ohio) began its European tour at Colston Hall on March 28.

BURNLEY.—'The Dream of Gerontius' was given by the Municipal Choir and the Hallé Orchestra under Sir Hamilton Harty on March 23. The three principal singers were Miss Margaret Balfour, Mr. Francis Russell, and Mr. Arthur Cranmer.

CHESHAM.—The Choral Society, conducted by Mr. R. B. Green, gave 'The Creation' at Broadway Baptist Church on March 14, the principal singers being Miss Gwladys Naish, Mr. John Chandler, and Mr. Joseph Farrington.

COLCHESTER.—The Musical Society's programme, under the direction of Mr. W. F. Kingdon, on March 20, consisted of Charles Wood's 'A Ballad of Dundee' and Parry's 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day.'

CROMER.—At the annual concert of the Orchestral Society on March 14 the principal works played under the direction of Miss F. Muriel were Purcell's 'The Married Beau' (with wind parts added by Gustav Holst), Beethoven's eighth Symphony, a Suite for strings by Domenico Scarlatti arranged by Julius Harrison, and the 'Ruy Blas' Overture.

DERBY.—A performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius,' under Sir Henry Coward, brought the season of the Choral Union to an end on March 22. Miss Muriel Brunskill, Mr. Steuart Wilson, and Mr. Howard Fry sang the principal parts. The programme also included 'Blest Pair of Sirens.'

DISS.—The Choral Society has been able to give only one concert during the winter season, but it was a performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius.' The choir sang its part with great credit, and there was an efficient orchestra. Mr. W. H. Aldrich conducted.

FOLKESTONE.—Mr. Basil Cameron and his Hastings Orchestra joined forces with Mr. Eldridge Newman and the Folkestone Orchestra on March 18, and the conductors shared a programme of popular classics. A return visit was arranged for March 25.——Sir Thomas Beecham conducted the Folkestone Orchestra on April 1 in Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony.

GLOUCESTER.—At the Shire Hall, on March 21, Mr. H. W. Sumsion conducted the Choral Society in Brahms's 'Requiem.' The orchestra, largely composed of members of the Gloucestershire Orchestral Society, played Boyce's first Symphony for strings.

GRIMSBY.—The Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Percy Wilson, gave a performance of 'The Kingdom' on March 26, with the assistance of a string orchestra and Miss G. Hunter at the pianoforte. The principal parts were sung by Miss Jessie Hewson, Miss Ethel Barker, Mr. Wilfred Miles, and Mr. Edgar Elmes.

GUERNSEY.—The Guille-Allès Festival was held on March 14 and 15 under the direction of Mr. George T. Acres, who has taken up the conductorship of the Festival on the retirement of Mr. John David. The choir numbered a hundred and fifty voices, and there was an orchestra of nearly forty. The chief works in the programme were 'The Hymn of Praise' and Hubert Bath's 'The Wake of O'Connor.'

HULL.—Glazounov's Symphony in C minor was conducted by Sir Henry Wood at a concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra on April 4.

IPSWICH.—Franck's Symphony was the chief work of the programme given by the Orchestral Society, under Mr. E. R. Wilby, on March 21. The Symphony had also been played by the Society during the preceding season.——The music played by the International String Quartet on March 20 included, besides Quartets by Mozart and Brahms, the three Fantasias by Purcell and Goossens's 'Two Sketches.'

KENDAL.—There was a large and appreciative audience on March 17 for the concert of the Choral Society, at which Mr. J. Smallwood Winder conducted 'The Music-Makers' and 'Phaudrig Crohoore.'

LEEDS.—Sir Henry Coward conducted the Leeds Choral Union for the last time, on March 19, after an association of twenty-four years. The concert was one of unusual musical interest as a revival of Parry's 'King Saul,' the last and, as many think, the best of a great series of oratorios. The choir sang its part with all the virtues of tone and expression which are the characteristic outcome of Sir Henry's training. The five soloists were Miss Joan Elwes, Miss Muriel Brunskill, Mr. Leonard Gowings, Mr. Howard Fry, and Mr. Roy Henderson. At the end of the concert a presentation was made to Sir Henry Coward.——On March 20 the Leeds Philharmonic Society, conducted by Dr. Bairstow, gave Vaughan Williams's 'Sancta Civitas' and, as on the occasion when Dr. Bairstow first introduced this work at York, the performance was repeated at the end of the concert. The solo part was sung by Mr. Arthur Cranmer.——Boyce's fourth Symphony was played by the strings and horns of the Symphony Society at a concert under Mr. Harold Mason, on March 23.——Brahms's Clarinet Quintet was played at one of the Bohemian Chamber Concerts, and the 'Liebeslieder' Waltzes were sung by a vocal quartet at a Mid-day Recital.

LEICESTER.—'The Apostles' was performed on April 9 by the Philharmonic Society under the direction of Sir Henry Wood, who had brought with him thirty of his Queen's Hall players from London to help in the orchestra.——The chief works played by the Symphony Orchestra on March 14, under Dr. Malcolm Sargent, were the 'Jupiter' Symphony and Berlioz's 'Benvenuto Cellini' Overture.

LIVERPOOL.—The two concerts given by the Philharmonic Society in March were of unusual interest. They were both conducted by Sir Henry Wood. Vaughan Williams's 'Pastoral' Symphony was played at the first, and at the second the choir gave a performance of 'Solomon,' the solo parts being taken by Miss Dora Labbette, Miss Stiles-Allen, Miss Margaret Balfour, Mr. Walter Widdop, and Mr. Stuart Robertson.——'The Creation' was given by the Welsh Choral Union on March 16.

LOWESTOFT.—Bach's 'Peasant Cantata' and Rowley's nautical Fantasia 'By the Deep, Nine' were the chief works given by the Musical Society (founded in 1877), under Mr. C. J. Coleman, on March 14.

MANCHESTER.—The last two Hallé programmes in March were 'The Flying Dutchman' and a selection that included some Berlioz, Mozart, and Wagner, and Strauss's 'Don Juan.'——Fallowfield Orchestral Society gave Elgar's 'Carillon' and the Variations from Tchaikovsky's Suite in G, under Mr. Morris Johnstone.——Mr. R. Richmond conducted the choir of the Manchester and Salford Caledonian Association in a programme of modern part-songs.——Sir Hamilton Harty was pianist at a concert of the Catterall Quartet, and took part in Mozart's G minor Pianoforte Quartet and Medtner's Violin Sonata.

NEWCASTLE.—The Bach Choir, with assistance from the Armstrong College Choral Society, sang Bach's Mass in B minor for the fourth time on March 24. Dr. Whittaker conducted.

NEWCASTLE (Staffs.).—The recently-formed Newcastle Choral Society, conducted by Mr. A. E. Green, gave its first performance on Good Friday evening at St. Giles's Church, the work chosen being Fletcher's 'The Passion of Christ.'

NORTHWICH.—A performance of Mendelssohn's 'Athalie' was given recently by the Philharmonic Society, under Mr. J. Patterson Shaw. The choir also sang 'The Challenge of Thor,' from 'King Olaf.' An orchestra of thirty assisted.

NORWICH.—At the Municipal Concert on March 16, an audience of over a thousand listened to thirteen numbers from Saint-Saëns's 'The Animals' Carnival' and Haydn's 'Farewell' Symphony.——The fifth of Mr. Cyril Pearce's series of chamber concerts came to an end on March 14. Three of Parry's 'Songs of Farewell' were sung by St. Mary's choir, and the orchestra played Bloch's Concerto Grosso.

PENRITH.—Mr. J. Pollard conducted the Musical Society—a chorus of a hundred and fifty and a largely professional orchestra of forty—in a performance of 'King Olaf' on March 21.

PLYMOUTH.—Sapellnikov played Rachmaninov's second Pianoforte Concerto at the fifth and last of the symphony concerts conducted by Mr. Ernest W. Goss.

RUGBY.—The Philharmonic Society, assisted by an orchestra from Birmingham, gave Bach's Mass in B minor on March 19, under the direction of Mr. Kenneth A. Stubbs, music master at Rugby School.

ST. AUSTELL.—The Philharmonic Society gave Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' at the Parish Church on March 21, with accompaniment of organ and string orchestra. The performance was under the direction of Mr. W. Brennand Smith, who presided at the organ.

SHEFFIELD.—The fifty-third season of the Musical Union came to an end on March 21 with a performance of 'Omar Khayyàm,' under Sir Henry Coward, with Miss Muriel Brunskill, Mr. Parry Jones, and Mr. Roy Henderson as principals. The choral work was preceded by the Finale from Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony.

SKIPTON.—A performance of 'A Tale of Old Japan' was given on March 12 by the Skipton Choral Society, under Mr. Arthur Townsend.

SOUTHPORT.—The principal work in the programme given by the Orchestral Society on March 20, under Mr. Matthews, was Harty's 'Irish' Symphony.

SUNDERLAND.—For the first time since 1888 the Sunderland Philharmonic Society performed 'Samson,' on March 20. Mr. Jarman conducted, and the principal parts were taken by Miss Megan Thomas, Miss Hilda Rood, Mr. Joseph Farrington, and Mr. Barrington Hooper.

WALSALL.—A selection from 'Dido and Æneas' (which excluded Æneas) was given by the Philharmonic Society on April 8, under the direction of Mr. Horace Davies. A band of dancers assisted, and the chorus sang behind the scenes. Miss Phyllis Goulden was the Dido.

WORCESTER.—A programme of great diversity was chosen by Sir Ivor Atkins for the concert given by the Worcestershire Orchestral and Ladies' Choral Society on March 20. The orchestra played Borodin's Symphony in B minor, selections from the 'Water Music,' Parry's 'Lady Radnor's Suite,' and an Overture, 'Barton Fair,' by Alexander Brent-Smith. The choral pieces included two mediæval songs, 'The Maiden that is Makeles' and 'Hymn to the Virgin,' Byrd's 'Lullaby,' Gluck's 'If to thine ears' (from 'Orpheus'), Geoffrey Shaw's 'How far is it to Bethlehem?', Holst's 'Sorrow and Joy,' and two of Elgar's songs 'From the Bavarian Highlands.' A group of songs by Miss Isabel Lamond maintained the interest and variety of the programme.

WORTHING.—Brahms's 'Academic Festival Overture,' a Symphony in E flat by Haydn, and Tchaikovsky's 'Variations on a Rococo Theme,' played by Miss May Mukle, were the chief works given by the Orchestral Society on March 16, under Mr. William Breat.

Music in Scotland

ARDROSSAN.—Ardrossan, Saltcoats, and Stevenston Choral Society gave a concert performance of Wallace's 'Maritana' in Saltcoats Town Hall.

BLAIRGOWRIE.—Blairgowrie and Rattray Choral Society gave a performance of Haydn's 'The Creation.' Mr. E. F. Parker conducted.

DUNFERMLINE.—The programme of a concert given by the Dunfermline Amateur Orchestral Society (conductor, Mr. J. Peebles Conn) included Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, the Handel-Harty 'Water Music,' and Elgar's Serenade for strings. The Carnegie Dunfermline Trustees have announced their decision to discontinue providing an unresponsive public with Scottish Orchestra and 'celebrity' concerts.

EDINBURGH.—At the concluding concert of the Reid Symphony Orchestra series, the programme comprised Bruckner's Symphony No. 6, in A, Beethoven's 'Emperor' Concerto (pianoforte, Dr. John Petrie Dunn), and Schubert's 'The Faithful Sentinel' Overture. Prof. Tovey conducted.——Prof. Tovey closed his season of Sunday concerts with a pianoforte and vocal recital, in which he had the co-operation of Miss Marie Thomson (soprano), and a concert by the Reid Symphony Orchestra, the programme comprising Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in C major (soloist, Miss Janet Grierson), Brahms's Pianoforte Concerto in B flat (pianist, Prof. Tovey; conductor, Dr. Mary Grierson), and Schubert's 'The Conspiracy of Wives' Overture.——At one of Prof. Tovey's University Historical concerts, the Elizabethan Choir, conducted by Mr. Percy Snowden, performed Mozart's Missa Brevis in F major (K.192).——A recital by the choir and orchestra of the Edinburgh Bach Society (Dr. Mary Grierson conducting) included the Church Cantata 'Der Geist hilft unser Schwacheit auf,' some Church pieces by Taverner, Wilbye, and Byrd, a transcription for oboe, violin, and accompanying strings (probably its original form) of Bach's Concerto No. 1, in C minor, for two pianofortes and strings, and a transcription for solo violin and strings, in G minor, of the Concerto in F minor for clavier.——Mr. W. B. Moonie's Choir concluded its season with a performance of Handel's 'Judas Maccabæus.'——The Edinburgh Royal Choral Union (conductor, Mr. Greenhouse Allt) gave what was announced as a bi-centenary performance of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion in Usher Hall.——Edinburgh Amateur Orchestral Society (conductor, Mr. Ralph T. Langdon) played at its second concert Beethoven's second Symphony, Auber's 'Masaniello' Overture, Elgar's second 'Wand of Youth' Suite, and an Idyll, entitled 'Waverley,' by the conductor. Mr. Kenneth Anderson played Mozart's Violin Concerto No. 3, in G.——A week of opera in the King's Theatre by the Edinburgh Grand Opera Society comprised three performances of Goldmark's 'The Queen of Sheba' and four of Offenbach's 'The Tales of Hoffmann,' with Mr. Herbert More as conductor and Mr. Hebden Foster as producer.——At a meeting of guarantors and subscribers in connection with the Paterson Orchestral (Scottish Orchestra) concerts, a deficit of £434 on the past season (the thirty-ninth) was announced, involving a call of 4*s.* 4*d.* in the £ on the guarantors as against 4*s.* 9*d.* in the £ for the previous season.——Mr. Godfrey's Choir (conductor, Mr. Gavin Godfrey) gave a concert performance of Gounod's 'Faust.'——An enterprising item in the programme of a concert given by the Girl Guides' Choir (Miss Evelyn M'Clure and Mrs. Alexander Maitland) was the second Act of Gluck's 'Orpheus and Eurydice.'——The programme of the ninth annual concert of the Edinburgh Catholic Choral Society (conductor, Mr. W. B. Moonie) included the so-called 'Mozart's Twelfth Mass,' Beethoven's 'Hallelujah,' and miscellaneous choral items.——Under the direction of Mrs. Alexander Maitland and Miss Susan Lushington, a stage performance of Purcell's 'Dido and Æneas' was given in Lauriston Hall with the assistance of the Scottish Girls' Friendly Society Choir and members of the Reid Orchestra.——The latest addition to the choral resources of Edinburgh, the Athenian Choir, gave a first concert of part-songs, mostly Scottish. Mr. Thomas Butcher conducted.——At the forty-second annual concert of the Leith Amateur Orchestral Society (conductor, Mr. W. Gilchrist Cochrane) the principal work performed was Haydn's Symphony No. 11, in G.——St. Andrew Amateur Orchestral Society (conductor, Mr. Watt Jupp) gave its forty-fifth annual concert.——Pilrig Choral and Dramatic Society gave two performances of Gluck's 'Orpheus and Eurydice.'——Mr. Kenneth Anderson (violin) and Mr. G. Forrest Newlands (pianoforte) gave a recital of Sonatas for violin and pianoforte by Mozart, Beethoven, and Elgar.——The large string orchestra of the Edinburgh Highland Reel and Strathspey Society gave its forty-eighth annual concert of reels and strathspeys. Mr. Ian C. Menzies conducted.——Miss Dorothy Mackintosh, a young Edinburgh violinist, gave a first recital.——Mr. Robert Taylor gave a pianoforte recital.——Mr. Paul Della Torre, the veteran Edinburgh pianist and composer, was entertained to dinner by the members of the Scottish Liberal Club.

GLASGOW.—At the third musical evening of the Fellowes String Quartet special interest attached to three Rhapsodies by George Dyson, drawing their inspiration from Dante's 'Divine Comedy.' The programme included also Beethoven's Quartet in B flat, Op. 18, No. 6, and Brahms's Quartet in B flat, Op. 67.——The Glasgow Arion Choir (conductor, Mr. William Robertson) gave an attractive programme of madrigals and part-songs.——The choir and orchestra of the Glasgow Bach Society gave an Easter performance of the 'St. John' Passion in Glasgow Cathedral. Mr. Steuart Wilson and Mr. Herbert Heyner were the principal soloists. Mr. Henry Haveral directed the performance, Miss Margaret Ludwig led the orchestra, and Miss Jean Hamilton took charge of the continuo work. The programme of a chamber concert given by the chamber orchestra of the Glasgow Bach Society included Bach's Concertos in C major and D minor for three pianofortes and strings (soloists, Miss Ailie Cullen, Mr. Wilfrid Senior, and Mr. S. G. Askham), a transcription for solo violin (Miss Margaret Ludwig) and strings of the Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, and a Chamber Suite for strings from the Symphonies of William Boyce. Mr. F. H. Bisset conducted.——The annual March concert of the Glasgow Orpheus Choir (Mr. Hugh S. Roberton) ran for two evenings, and presented a wide and attractive range of part-songs, madrigals, and old Scottish Psalm-tunes. On some past occasions we have felt that the Orpheus showed a lack of spontaneity in some of its work, suggesting over-training or over-familiarity. Here, however, throughout the entire programme 'all the ardour of the spring' moved and throbbed. The Orpheus Choir also visited Edinburgh, Aberdeen, Elgin, Dundee, Manchester, and London (two concerts).——The Glasgow Orpheus Choir Juniors and Sangspiel gave their fifth annual concert, the programme comprising two- and three-part songs, unison songs, action-songs, singing games, country dances, and eurhythmic movements. Mr. Roberton conducted the Junior Choir, taking the place of Mrs. Catherine Armstrong, who left last month to settle in the United States. Mrs. Armstrong has been for the past fifteen years the outstanding children's choir-trainer in Scotland. It is profoundly to be hoped that America will take the opportunity to make use of so notable a talent.——The Ingram Choir, drawn from the warehouse staffs of Messrs. Campbells and Stewart & Macdonalds, Ltd., gave its annual concert of part-songs, &c. Mr. William Nisbet conducted.——At its second concert, the Glasgow Amateur Orchestral Society, ably directed by Mr. J. Peebles Conn, presented Goldmark's 'Rustic Wedding' Symphony, Humperdinck's 'Hansel and Gretel' Overture, Schubert's 'Italian' Overture, and the Gluck-Mottl Ballet Suite.——At the annual concert of the Glasgow University Choral Society (conductor, Mr. A. M. Henderson) the programme included Mozart's setting of Psalm 91, and smaller choral pieces.——Glasgow Y.M.C.A. Choir (conductor, Mr. W. N. Macquarrie) concluded its season's work with a performance of Mendelssohn's 'Elijah.'——The Wallace Scott (Factory) Choir gave a varied programme of part-songs and operatic choruses at its annual concert. Mr. Macquarrie acted as conductor in succession to the late F. O. Sheard.——The solo singing of Mr. John Coates gave added distinction to an enjoyable programme of part-songs, &c., ably sung by the Glasgow Philharmonic Male-Voice Choir, Mr. Robert H. Howie conducting.——The old-established Glasgow Select Choir, under the direction of Mr. Thorpe Davie, gave a programme of part-songs of a rather more enterprising type than heretofore.——Wellington Church Choir, directed by Mr. Fred Turner and Mr. J. M. Beaton, gave a performance of Handel's 'Israel in Egypt.'——The Scottish Oils, Ltd., Staff Choir (conductor, Mr. James Smith) gave its second annual concert of part-songs and glees.——The Scottish Song Society Ladies' Choir (conductor, Miss Mary Dixon) gave its annual concert of part-songs.——In St. Matthew's U.F. Church, the enterprising Mr. Erik Chisholm presented de Falla's 'Nights in the Gardens of Spain,' Holst's 'The Morning of the Year,' Kodály's 'Hungarian Psalm,' and Franck's Symphonic Variations, the organ taking the place of the orchestra throughout. In the Kodály Psalm most of the chorus work was simply omitted, and as a whole the enterprising programme proved over-ambitious.——The choir of All Saints' Church, Jordanhill, gave two performances of the setting of the 'St. Luke' Passion doubtfully attributed to Bach.——At the annual orchestral concert of the Scottish National Academy of Music, the students' orchestra, substantially reinforced by professionals, played Beethoven's fourth Symphony, Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' Overture, and other works.

GREENOCK.—Greenock Festival Ladies' Choir (conductor, Mr. W. M'Leod Nicolson) gave a programme of part-songs.

LINLITHGOW.—The programme of the annual spring concert of the Linlithgow Choral Union (conductor, Mr. T. Finlay, Edinburgh) included Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer' and part-songs.

PAISLEY.—Paisley Choral Union (conductor, Dr. William Rigby) presented Sullivan's 'The Golden Legend.'

STIRLING.—Stirling Choral Society (conductor, Mr. R. K. MacCallum) gave a performance of Handel's 'Judas Maccabæus,' which showed a marked falling away from the efficient standard of past seasons.——The Stirling Arion Choir (conductor, Mrs. May Carruthers Greig) gave a concert of madrigals and part-songs.

GENERAL.—The Westminster Choir, from Dayton, Ohio, U.S.A., gave concerts of sacred music at Edinburgh and Glasgow, and was warmly received by audiences of moderate size. The choir, a young one, shows promise rather than achievement. The individual voices are of really fine quality, and reveal at times a remarkably rich and smooth sonority of ensemble and at other times a floating pianissimo of ethereal loveliness. The drill and discipline are mechanically perfect. The fineness of the shading is a feature. The chording is pure, and the intonation remarkably secure. The diction is clear, but very lacking in significance, the choir's utterance being curiously level and the consonants in need of energising. The vowelling is fairly pure, but the 'oo' vowel is a consistent offender. Rapid articulation is thick and close-mouthed, with inadequate lip-mobility and over-long vowelling. Tip-toe whispering practice would revolutionise this. The runs are over-articulated, through a consistent interpolation of the aspirate. The choir is fortunate in its trainer, Mr. John Finley Williamson. He has a quiet, competent style, and an agreeably modest platform manner. But his gestures lack grip, variety, and—at times—sweep. It is hardly possible, with so mild and restricted a beat, to draw from singers the torrent of rhythmic and dynamic energy called for in a Bach Motet. On the interpretative side the choir's work is sincere, but negative—too docile and student-like. It lacks elemental qualities, virility, vitality, resiliency, bite—in short, it lacks emotional and rhythmic impulse. However moved the singers may have been by the music, they do not appear to be moved by it at the moment of performance, without which the dry bones cannot be made to live. The Dayton Choir has undoubted possibilities of greatness, but it has still to learn, at least in its public appearances, to lift up its heart as well as its voice in song. SEBASTIAN.

Music in Ireland

BELFAST.—At the Philharmonic concert on March 15 the chief works were 'Acis and Galatea' and Harty's suite of 'Fantasy Scenes from an Eastern Romance.' Mr. E. Godfrey Brown conducted.——Brahms's 'Requiem' was sung in the Cathedral on March 24, under the direction of Capt. C. J. Brennan.——Miss Ethel Bartlett and Mr. Rae Robertson gave a two-pianoforte recital for the B.M.S., the programme ranging from Couperin to Bax's 'The Poisoned Fountain' and 'Moy Mell.'

DUBLIN.—On March 16 the Philharmonic Society gave its last concert of the season. Brahms's 'Tragic' Overture, Ina Boyle's 'The Magic Harp,' and Wagner's 'Good Friday Music' were conducted by Col. Fritz Braze, and Mr. J. Turner Huggard conducted Brahms's 'Requiem.'——The programme given by the Culwick Choral Society on March 21 included the Sanctus from the B minor Mass, three choruses from Holst's 'The Coming of Christ,' and part-songs by Parry, Elgar, and Armstrong Gibbs.——The University Choral Society, under Dr. George Hewson, gave Mozart's Mass in C minor.

Music in Wales

ABERYSTWYTH.—At the usual end-of-term College concert on March 15, Sapellnikov gave a pianoforte recital, his programme including Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. 111), a group of Chopin solos, and some Russian numbers.

BARRY DOCK.—On March 27 the Tabernacle Choral Society gave a successful performance of Bach's 'Iesu Dyrchafedig' ('The Lord ascendeth'), and two small works by Welsh composers—'Dyn a aned o Wraig' ('Man that is born of woman'), by D. Christmas Williams, and 'Deffro, mae'n Ddydd' ('Awake, for it is day'), by David Evans.

CARDIFF.—On March 16, at the weekly College concert, a quartet composed of staff members and students played Dvorák's String Quartet (Op. 96), and the students' choir sang a number of Welsh and English part-songs, including a Welsh version of Robert Edwards's madrigal, 'In going to my lonely bed.'——During the past month the National Orchestra of Wales has given Glazounov's Symphony No. 8, Weber's Bassoon Concerto (soloist, Mr. Fawcett), Mozart's Violin Concerto in E flat (soloist, Mr. Albert Voorsanger), and, in conjunction with a chorus of members of the Cardiff Musical Society and the Lyrian Singers, several scenes from Wagner's operas and Kodály's 'Psalmus Hungaricus.'

LLANELLY.—At the County School an end-of-term concert was given, at which the orchestra played Handel's Overture to 'Otto,' Haydn's 'London' Symphony, and Bach's Violin Concerto (soloist, Mr. Elvet Marks). Pianoforte solos were given by Miss Gwenda Vaughan, including Debussy's 'La Cathédrale Engloutie.'——On April 7, at the Y.M.C.A., the same orchestra played the Overture to 'Otto,' a group of Handel melodies arranged by Mr. Haydn Jones, the Overture to 'Figaro' (Mozart), and the 'London' Symphony. As a result the local Rotary Club is trying to form a permanent orchestra in the town.——A number of local choral societies have given performances of Brahms's 'Requiem,' 'St. Paul,' 'Samson,' and Rossini's 'Stabat Mater.'

MERTHYR.—A successful performance of 'Israel in Egypt' was given by the Choral Society on March 21, conducted by Mr. W. J. Watkins.

NEWPORT.—Bach's Mass in B minor was sung on April 9 by the Newport Choral Society, assisted by members of the Bristol Choral Society. Mr. Arthur E. Sims conducted.

Musical Notes from Abroad

BRUNO WALTER AND THE GERMAN OPERATIC CRISIS

It has happened as everybody expected: the existence of three opera-houses at Berlin has brought a crisis. Operatic inflation, as we may call it, is a natural consequence of the changed political and economic situation in Germany. In former times the number of opera-houses was justified by the many princely subventions in the many small States of the Empire. Under the present changed conditions and financial distress the number is excessive, as the municipal authorities are perfectly aware. But one cannot get rid of superfluous opera-houses. While it is felt all over Germany, the operatic crisis leads to particularly unpleasant consequences at Berlin, where it is natural that the high standard of operatic activity demanded in the capital can be maintained only at the greatest expense. Can it really be maintained at all?

Bruno Walter, the man whose experience in operatic matters can hardly be surpassed among musicians, foresaw the crisis in Berlin opera four years ago, and, despairing of seeing it solved under the present system, sketched a project for simplifying the situation and for saving opera just by this simplification. He proposed to unite the State and Municipal Opera Houses, employing one company of principals, but maintaining a separate chorus and orchestra for each house. He hoped in this way to give first-rate performances of a repertory reasonably divided between the two opera-houses. The first condition of this change would have been that some outstanding personalities among the singers (who, for the present, spend a great part of the season in America) would be under contract to devote the whole of their activity to Berlin. This would, of course, mean higher payment. The project was fully approved by Heinz Tietjen, the Intendant of the Municipal Opera House, who in the meantime had also become General-Intendant of the State Opera House; so it was expected that the scheme would be carried out.

It could not be denied that under Walter's direction the Municipal Opera House had risen to the first position among Berlin opera-houses. It was just this fact that prevented Bruno Walter from seeing his hopes fulfilled, for the municipal authorities desired him to keep his post. At the same time it was understood that Walter's plan was being further jeopardised by certain offers that were made to Furtwängler (who had recently refused the post of General-Director at the Vienna State Opera).

Seeing that the situation was becoming more and more critical, Walter sent an ultimatum to the Oberbürgermeister declaring his intention to resign unless the re-organization as sketched by both himself and Tietjen, and approved in principle also by the Minister of Public Instruction, were carried into effect under his musical direction.

For some weeks a Bruno Walter crisis held all Berlin music-lovers in suspense. It has terminated now in Bruno Walter's resolution to quit. He expects, no doubt, to see the situation change in his favour on the lapse of Erich Kleiber's present contract as leading general musical director of the State Opera House. At the moment, however, we have the sad spectacle of a musician inspired with high ideals retiring from the operatic stage. And this happens just after Walter's activities at the Munich Opera House have come to an end.

HOLLAND

Paderewski's appearances at Amsterdam and The Hague were as notable for the way in which they were regarded by the Dutch public and critics as for the playing of the master himself. With such a reputation as his it was practically impossible that he should be received with the indifference accorded to the ordinary newcomer whose reputation is smaller, but the Dutchmen maintained their attitude of independence and freedom of judgment to a remarkable degree. Even some of the public waited until they had read the verdicts of their favourite local critics before taking the trouble to hear him for themselves. Consequently the first recital in each town was attended by smaller and less expectant crowds than its successor. The critics, for their part, steadfastly set themselves against and refused to succumb to the magic of his personality. He was a pianist; possibly one of the greatest pianists of all history, but nevertheless a manipulator of mechanism and sounds whose methods must be analysed, whose powers must be appraised by certain standards to which they did not invariably in all details conform. The artistic and popular triumph of the great man was complete, but it is questionable whether in any other country it has during the last four decades had to be won so entirely afresh.

Winifred Christie came here with the dice loaded against her—she was introducing a new instrument (the Pleyel Moor pianoforte), and she included in her programme a transcription, and of all works ever written the one least amenable, from the point of view of the average Dutch music-lover, to transcription—Bach's Chaconne for violin. This and the modernisation of Beethoven's fourth Pianoforte Concerto proved too much, so that while everything was done in an admittedly clever way, it was not 'the thing,' and the conservative and 'proper' critics did not like it, while the general public who attended her concert and recital were divided.

An artist who is making rapid strides in the favour of Dutch audiences is Isolde Menges, whose purity of style and complete technical mastery, combined with a well-controlled but enthusiastic artistic temperament, provide exactly what such audiences wish. Both at her own recitals and in concertos with the big orchestras she has now a strong following.

A number of novelties and quasi-novelties have figured in the Concertgebouw programmes during the last few weeks, the most striking of which is the Magnificat of Heinrich Kaminski. The work is no mere setting of the sacred hymn, but is an elaborate attempt to express the mystic atmosphere surrounding the occasion of its origin. A soprano soloist (Lotte Leonard) represents the Virgin, there is a choir of female voices, a 'distant choir' of mixed voices, which adds to the mystic element, and full orchestra. The text consists of only a part of the Magnificat, together with the Ave Maria, Gloria Patri, and interspersed Hosannas. It is a strikingly individual work, which speaks with conviction, but which yet must be heard a number of times before one can definitely 'place' it.

A Concertino for pianoforte by Lon Lichtveld, one of the younger Dutch composers, produced by the Haarlem Orchestral Society under Eduard van Beinum, with Alide van Uitvanck as soloist, showed considerable progress technically and a real growth in personality on the part of the composer. The few experiments in tonal variety invariably 'come off,' and the working up to the climax is effective. Best of all, it is really a work for pianoforte and not merely an orchestral work with a pianoforte in the score.

Rudolf Mengelberg's Symphonic Variations for 'cello and orchestra (Op. 15), in which the solo part was played by Gaspar Cassado, is similarly the strongest and most original work which has yet come from its creator's pen, and will probably be popular alike with artists and audiences.

ITALY

MILAN

During the Easter holidays nearly all the churches announced special music, but unfortunately the only service of importance that was not too far away was that in the Cathedral, on Easter Sunday morning. A Mass by Angelo Albergoni was performed, with the exception of the Kyrie, which is not included in the Ambrosian (Milan) service. This work was awarded a prize some years ago, and has since, on account of its nature, been more or less forgotten. It is written for two organs and a choir of sixty voices, and being almost purely polyphonic, suggests both Bach and Palestrina. Its harmonies, however, are now and then quite modern, and the work bears no resemblance to any other that the present writer can call to mind.

Unfortunately, the overwhelming vastness of the Duomo reacts against the acoustics, and the constant movement in the building spoiled the general effect. At a rough guess there were about twenty thousand people present, and the chair-sellers (chairs are to be hired for ten centimes each) and the whispering of the people made so much noise that it was useless to aim at any delicacy of interpretation.

The boys' voices here have a quite different quality from those of English boys; one might say that they correspond to the adult Italian voice, which, as everyone is aware, is easily distinguishable from that of the Teuton or Anglo-Saxon. One cannot bestow very high praise upon the Milanese as choral singers; there were frequent occasions when a decided lack of co-ordination was evident, but beyond that one could certainly feel their sincerity. It should be worth while for English choirs to get hold of this work, as it presents no insuperable difficulties, abounds in merit, and is eminently suitable for concerts or, in an English version, Church work.

Joseph Szigeti, who gave an interesting programme of violin music, was rewarded with a big audience, and won the entire approval both of press and public. The Sonata in G, by Debussy, 'Baal Shem' by Bloch, and one of Bach's solo sonatas, were the principal items. Tartini, Bartók, and de Falla were other composers on his list. The Bloch work was especially good.

THE RUSSIAN NATIONAL ORCHESTRA

This so-called orchestra of balalaika players was heard with keen interest. The instruments produced a sound more like xylophones than anything else. They had a chorus and soloists, and filled out their programme with familiar and unfamiliar Russian music. Naturally they did the 'Volga.' A bass soloist was one of the most pleasing of the artists.

THE OPERAS AT LA SCALA

During Toscanini's absence in America, interest flags somewhat in opera. This is entirely unjust, as his chief deputy, Ettore Panizza, if not what our American cousins call a 'high light,' is a sound and intelligent musician. His production of Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Czar Saltan' was both delicate and forceful. It was the first time that the opera had been given in Italy, and it was well received.

Musically there is nothing extraordinary in the opera beyond the simply gorgeous tone-colours. There are many moments when one is carried into ecstasies over the perfection of workmanship in the development and laying out of ideas. Yet in the same instant one deplores the lack of inspiration.

The performance left only one thing to be desired. The soprano who sang the music of the swan was persistently off pitch, and absolutely unintelligible. She sang badly enough to be the product of a modern Italian maestro who specialises in foreign students. Umberto de Lelio was the Czar, and made one of his specialties of the rôle. His genial personality and fat voice were adapted to the part, and his comicality was very delightful. As the Czarina, Bruna Rasa was effective and pleasing. The wonder boy, Guy, was most convincing when, as a hornet (perfectly done by a little ballerina), he went about doing his stinging.

Scenically there was much to admire. The sets had been designed on the lines now in vogue in Russia, and proved refreshing both to the mind and to the eye.

LA CAMPANA SOMMERSA

This new opera by Ottorino Respighi, which had its first performance in Germany a short time ago, and which has since been given at the Metropolitan in New York, with no very encouraging results, received its first performance at La Scala (and in Italy) at the time of our writing. Hauptmann's Fantasy 'The Sunken Bell' needs no introduction, and is well enough known to make description unnecessary.

The difficulties of setting such a work are manifest, and, honestly speaking, Respighi was not the right man to attempt it. He is too distant from the 'human' side of his drama, and where infinite variety of method is not sufficient, his scope of invention is too limited.

The performance was on a par with the opera. Panizza did as much with the beautiful score as was humanly possible, and gave occasion for the hearing of some of the most delightful orchestral colours and treatments that one could wish for. The symphonic writer in Respighi, refined, aristocratic to the degree of being thin-blooded, was far more in evidence than the opera writer. The sonority reached its greatest heights at the close of the third Act. Of the singers, Pertile and the soprano Saraceni were the most satisfactory. The other important part was taken, rather unhappily, by Mércèdes Llopart, one of those 'accurate' singers with indifferent means.

Many curtains were taken by the artists, the author, the composer, the conductor, and Dr. Lert, director of the setting.

CHARLES D'IF.

NEW YORK

By common consent this has been the dullest season in New York's recent musical experience, and while such jeremiads are by no means uncommon during the latter half of the season, they are taken seriously this year, and seem to have rather more than the usual justification. One thinks back in a vain search for an outstanding musical experience.

New York, of course, is a spoiled city in musical matters. The comings and goings of the greatest and the great are of too frequent occurrence to rank among the season's headline events. Moreover, the impression that they make is usually by no means in due proportion to their musical significance. Walter Gieseking, for example, has played three or four times during the last few months without once filling that same Carnegie Hall that can hardly hold the audiences that storm it when a flashier and much less important pianist like Horowitz plays there. Myra Hess, despite the adulation that a limited audience reserves almost exclusively for her, did not once bring a capacity audience to the much smaller Town Hall. Meanwhile, for Ganna Walska's long-delayed appearance, for concerts of the Boston, Philadelphia, or New York Philharmonic Orchestras (irrespective of their programmes), for Chaliapin, Kreisler, and Yehudi Menuhin, tickets were always at a premium.

The thirst for orchestral concerts is one of the strangest, and in some ways one of the least gratifying, of concert-world phenomena. It is commonly said, above all in England, that American orchestras have reached a standard of excellence unapproached by even the best of European orchestras. I never heard the Philadelphia Orchestra in its hey-day, when Stokowski devoted his entire time to it (instead of leaving it, as he has for the last two years, chiefly in the hands of 'guest' conductors). But there are those, even among the critics, who say that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not far behind the Philadelphia at its greatest. I cannot understand why so many people think that either of these orchestras even approach the uncanny perfection of the Berlin Philharmonic or the Staatsoper Orchestra in Unter den Linden. It may be true that Furtwängler, Kleiber, and Walter do not rise to the heights of incandescence (this season's favourite descriptive term) at which burn the Kussewitzkian and Stokowskian flames; I should concede even that only for the sake of argument. But the German orchestras have routine virtues, excellences in metier, that one seeks in vain in America: clean attacks, nicely adjusted balances, rhythmic precision.

Toscanini admittedly brings the New York Philharmonic to a height to which it otherwise hardly even aspires. In many ways absolute supremacy seems not too strong a word to apply to him. But even under his incontestably magnificent baton I have heard rhythmic uncertainties, imperfections in intonation and attack, that would not for a moment be tolerated at Berlin.

The fact is that the spectacle of a strong and graceful man standing before an orchestra and miming the music, which is what the strong men from Boston and Philadelphia (and now Krauss from Frankfürt, less successfully) do, has a fascination for the New York audience that nothing can equal. I do not say that their delight is not partly musical, but it seems to me obvious that it is only partly so. To some extent the critics are swept along in this excitement, and they in turn are credited with an enormous influence on public opinion.

Of outstanding new works there have been regrettably few. $75,000 is the sum the Metropolitan Opera House is said to have spent on its tasteless and ineffective production of 'Jonny spielt auf.' The amount of money forthcoming for the presentation of music in less ostentatious and more important forms is not in proportion, although New York is rather more fortunate in this regard than most European capitals. Modern music especially has the benefit of performances whose quality is definitely higher than in most European cities. The League of Composers has presented some music of decided importance: Hindemith's Song-Cycle for voice and small instrumental combination; 'Die Junge Magd,' with Madame Cahier's invaluable assistance; and Schönberg's Quartet with voice. The Copland-Sessions concerts, a series which aims to present chamber music by American composers of the youngest generation, has brought forward much in the way of sensationalism and a good deal in the way of music. 'Pro Musica' has at least the visit and country-wide tour of Arthur Honegger to its credit.

Among the orchestral novelties two or three seem to have made an impression deep enough to be remembered. Ernest Bloch's epic rhapsody, 'America,' which won a $3,000 prize offered by Musical America, has, without doubt, I think, more musical substance than any of the others, mixed up as it is with passionately sincere expressions of a rather prophetic and non-musical nature. It is at times, surely, very great and deeply-moving music. It had a simultaneous première by five leading American orchestras, and has been played since then, I believe, some thirty-five times in all. Kussewitzky brought the premières of Stravinsky's 'Apollon Musagète' and a Pianoforte Concerto of Toch, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist. Stokowski is to conduct the first American stage performance of 'Les Noces,' under the auspices of the League of Composers, in a few weeks.

Respighi has had more premières during the season than one can (or likes to) think of. He is reported to have said that in Heaven he could not have wished for a better performance of his 'La Campana Sommersa' than the Metropolitan gave it. I am of those who hope that in Heaven 'La Campana Sommersa,' together with the Feasts, Pines, and Fountains of Rome, may not be heard at all.

Arthur Mendel.

TORONTO

The most important event of the year has been the Mendelssohn Choir Festival, held on Thursday to Saturday, February 7 to 9. As is the usual custom, three choral concerts were given, with the additional orchestral matinée on the Saturday. For each event the entire house was sold out.

It has been felt this year that both choir and orchestra (the Cincinnati Symphony under Fritz Reiner) have reached a stage in the history of their eventful co-operation which permits each willingly to submerge individual identity in a fuller and more finished unity. An artistic understanding of this nature penetrates quite deeply into such works as Wolf-Ferrari's 'La Vita Nuova,' the performance of which was heralded by the critics en masse as one of the most remarkable achievements in the history of choral music in Canada. Mr. Reiner and Dr. Fricker were entirely at one; the Mendelssohn Choir is this year more finely balanced and in richer tone than even the most optimistic could have anticipated; and the Cincinnati Orchestra, now so intensely masterful in both accompaniment and virtuoso work, seems to be viewed to-day as a definite part of our musical life at Toronto, rather than as a mere visiting body of unusual brilliance. And so it is generally held that smoothness of performance, in combination with a deeper spirituality, was the keynote of the festival. Madame Elizabeth Rethburg made a deep impression with the dignity and purity of her singing, although a serious illness prevented her appearance on the second night. Mr. Frazer Gange did splendid work both in 'La Vita Nuova' and also in Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet.'

The principal works performed, besides those mentioned, were Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' Mozart's Motet 'Splendente Te, Deus,' a cycle of Canadian folk-songs arranged for choral voices, di Lasso's 'Take my heart into your care,' Wesley's 'In exitu Israel,' Respighi's orchestral Suite 'The Birds,' and Brahms's first Symphony.

There have been two concerts by the Toronto Symphony Orchestra—the first introducing a novelty in the form of Parry's 'Pied Piper of Hamelin'—given in conjunction with the ambitious Toronto Conservatory Chorus under Dr. Ernest Macmillan. At the second, Dr. von Kunits presented a 'Rhapsodie Canadienne' by the Anglo-Canadian Robert Graham Manson, once of London and now leading the orchestra's second violins. This is a cleverly atmospheric work, abounding in racy rhythms.

Successful recitals have come from Chaliapin, Martinelli (both in splendid voice), Mlle. Madeleine Monnier, a gifted Parisian 'cellist, and the famous contralto Sigfrid Onegin, whose singing was a revelation in tone-quality, range, and artistry. H. C. F.

Obituary

We regret to record the following deaths:

JOSEPH COX BRIDGE, at St. Albans, on March 29. He was born in 1853, at Rochester, where his father was a lay-clerk at the Cathedral. Like his brother, John Frederick, who was his senior by nine years, he began his musical career as a chorister at that Cathedral, and, again like him, became pupil-assistant to the organist there, John Hopkins. At the age of seventeen he was appointed assistant to his brother at Manchester Cathedral. In 1871 he obtained an organ scholarship at Exeter College, Oxford, graduating Mus. Bac. in 1876, and Mus. Doc. in 1885. In 1877 he succeeded Frederick Gunton as organist of Chester Cathedral, where he remained until his retirement in 1925. Outside the Cathedral, his musical services to Chester were many. In 1879 he revived the Musical Festival, which had lapsed for fifty years, and showed uncommon ability both as organizer and conductor. He also founded the Chester Musical Society, and for twenty years both financed and conducted it. He did valuable research work in music and archæology, showing all his famous brother's enthusiasm for out-of-the-way lore. His musical activities soon extended far beyond Chester. From 1886 to 1889 he conducted the Bradford Festival Choral Society, and he deputised frequently for Hallé at Bristol and elsewhere. In 1908 he was appointed Professor of Music at Durham University, and he examined also for the Universities of Oxford and London. On his retirement from Chester he became Director of Trinity College of Music, London. He composed many works of various kinds, the more important among them being written for the Chester Festival. On settling in London he continued his interest in education and research by becoming President of the Musical Association.

SIMON VAN MILLIGEN, at Amsterdam, last month, at the age of seventy-nine. He was known to his own countrymen as a teacher, writer, editor, and composer, excelling in every one of these respects. To the foreigner his reputation was more limited, but in circles where research and solid scholarship are valued he had a considerable standing. His chief work is an exhaustive 'History of the Development of Music,' recently brought up-to-date by Sem Dresden, which is the standard work on this subject for Dutch students. He wrote a pamphlet on 'Modern Dutch Music,' which was widely distributed in America. As Chairman of the Examination Board of 'Toonkunst' and of various professional societies he enjoyed a personal popularity equal to his artistic reputation.

EDWARD OXENFORD, at Haddenham, Buckinghamshire, on March 15, aged eighty-two. Although he wrote many pieces for the stage, he will be remembered chiefly as a remarkably copious and successful writer of words for songs. No fewer than seven thousand came from his pen, and he also translated many songs, &c., from almost every European language. As a librettist, he had a hand in about two hundred operas, operettas, and cantatas, among the latter being 'Ruth,' set to music by A. R. Gaul.

J. PERCY ROBB, at Glasgow. For many years a prominent teacher of singing at Glasgow.

ANDRE SPOOR, on March 29, at The Hague, where for twenty-five years he had been Professor at the Royal Conservatorium. He was one of the best-known of the older generation of Dutch violinists, and a former pupil of Wirth, Massant, and Csillag. He made his first public appearance as an infant prodigy over fifty years ago, and at twenty years of age was Concert-meister at St. Petersburg. Later he held appointments at Charkow and Hamburg, under von Bülow. For ten years he was assistant-conductor of the Concertgebouw Orchestra under Mengelberg, and later of the Residentie Orchestra under Viotta. At the time of his death, which occurred quite suddenly, Spoor was sixty-one years old.

JANE MARIAN JOSEPH, in London, on March 9, aged thirty-four. She showed exceptional musical talent at an early age, and on leaving Girton College, where she conducted the choral society and orchestra, she entered the musical profession. As a composer she showed the influence of Holst, who was her teacher at St. Paul's Girls' School.

BURWOOD NICHOLLS, at Aberdeen, for forty years organist and choirmaster of Rubislaw Parish Church, Aberdeen. A native of Kent, he studied under Dr. Longhurst, Canterbury Cathedral; was later an articled pupil to the late W. S. Hoyte; and was much in demand for organ recitals and oratorio performances.

WILLIAM J. JONES, on March 6, aged seventy-two. He was a pianoforte maker, and for sixty-three years a member of the choir at St. Stephen's Church, Westminster. He joined at the age of eight, and sang on the last Sunday of his life.

JOHN HARRISON, on March 19, at Colne, Lancashire, aged sixty-one. He began his vocal career as a baritone, but later became a tenor, singing with great success in opera. About twenty years ago he was a popular figure at Covent Garden.

EDWIN LEMARE, on March 19, in his eighty-ninth year, at Ventnor, where for over sixty years he had been organist of Holy Trinity Church. He was the father of Edwin H. Lemare.

G. M. HOLMES DOUGLAS, at Glasgow. A well-known amateur operatic singer, president of the Glasgow Philharmonic Society, and one of the founders of the Glasgow Grand Opera Society.

Miscellaneous

The Tonic Sol-fa College will hold its fifty-third annual Summer Term Holiday Course for Music Teachers at College Buildings, Earlham Hall, Forest Gate, from July 30 to August 15. The lecturers will be Mr. Frederick Green, Mr. Granville Humphreys, Mr. Arthur Stork, and Mr. Walter Harrison. Full particulars from the Secretary, Tonic Sol-fa College, 26, Bloomsbury Square, W.C.1.

Stanford's 'The Revenge' and Beethoven's fourth Symphony were the principal items in the Boston (Lincs.) Society's concert on April 19, conducted by Dr. Bernard Jackson. A first performance was given of 'Orientale,' an orchestral piece by William Fenney. Miss Dorothy Silk was the soloist, and the Yorkshire String Quartet also took part.

Mr. Arthur G. Colborn has been presented with an illuminated address and a cheque to mark the completion of thirty years' service at Stapleton Church, Bristol. The presentation took place at a concert of his own compositions, organized by a committee of the church council.

The Billingborough Choral Society (Lincs.) performed Purcell's 'King Arthur' in an abridged version on April 11, assisted by soloists and a small orchestra from Boston. A well diversified programme included also several movements from Bach's Orchestral Suite in C. Dr. Bernard Jackson conducted.

Mr. B. Chambers, 90, Lawrence Road, Southsea, tells us that he has sixteen spare back numbers of the Musical Times which he will be pleased to forward to anyone who will pay the postage.

CHORALES

Harmonized by

J. S. BACH

Collected and arranged in melodic order by

H. ELLIOT BUTTON

THIS Collection of Chorales harmonized by Bach contains, it is believed, all those that he arranged for four voices. It includes also an index by means of which any Chorale can easily be found if the first few notes of the melody are known.

"JUDITH"

An Opera in one Act

Libretto by
ARNOLD BENNETT

Music by
EUGENE GOOSSENS

TO BE PRODUCED AT

Covent Garden Opera House

IN JUNE, 1929

THE production of an English Opera, in English, during the Grand Season at Covent Garden is an almost unheard-of event, and would in any case create a sensation. But this first performance of "JUDITH" will be especially significant because it is the product, not only of one of the most distinguished living British composers, but of his collaboration with a great English man of letters. Mr. Arnold Bennett's libretto would alone attract serious attention.

It is a remarkably powerful piece of work, admirably adapted to musical treatment by its swiftness of action and directness of expression; moreover, it is one of those rare instances in opera where poet & composer match each other.

The Music is unquestionably the strongest and most striking piece of work yet written by Eugène Goossens, and it will reveal an entirely new side of the composer's personality.

On a thoroughly individual system, ensuring to each Student the closest care and attention.

The following are a few extracts from successful pupils' letters:

"The way you anticipated the form which the questions asked at the examination would take (and in some cases the actual questions themselves), is wonderful."

"This agreeable result is due to your skilful tuition, and to the skill and patience of yourself and staff I owe very much."

"I much appreciated all the papers you set me, and all the interesting notes without which I should most probably have failed."

"Finger Magic"

HOW THE MASTER MUSICIAN IS MADE.

"I have been reading a little booklet which I have termed 'Finger Magic,' and I would very much like to place this book in the hands of every pianist, violinist, and 'cellist in the Kingdom.

"We all know that the secret of the virtuosi does not consist in the amount of time they expend in instrumental practice—one recently stated that he often does not touch the instrument for a week, and another has affirmed that musicians are positively superstitious about practice. The secret of the success of the great masters must therefore be looked for in another direction than in the capacity for hard grinding practice on orthodox lines, and I have been experimenting with a system which may well prove to be a solution, or at any rate to a large extent.

"The system to which I refer develops the hands not by practice in the ordinary sense, but by a series of exercises, based on sound psychological as well as physiological laws, and the descriptive booklet, issued by the Cowling Institute, contains some astonishing letters from musicians which would convince me, even if not backed up by my own experience, that the quickest and easiest way to develop the strength and flexibility of the wrist and fingers so essential to pianists, violinists, and 'cellists is to perform the operation away from the instrument, when the mind can be centred upon that object alone.

"I anticipate that within a measurable period the knowledge contained in this little booklet, and in the lessons given by the Cowling Institute, will form part of the curriculum of every teacher and be a necessary equipment of every violinist, 'cellist, and pianist."—

ERNEST JAY, F.R.C.O.

A REMARKABLE TRIBUTE

(One of hundreds of similar expressions of opinion)

DEAR MADAME LEVINSKAYA,

I feel that I must write and thank you for extending to me the very great privilege of listening to your wonderful Lecture Course.

I was marvellously impressed by the vividness and clarity of your thinking—and your method and ideas have so much greater value by virtue of the fact that unlike many clever precursors in your line of thinking you have had the wisdom to realise that your own findings, many of them wonderful and invaluable, do not of themselves, and isolated, form a "method." That is where so many otherwise clever and deep-thinking musicians have erred—they have made a "method" out of their own one or two findings—whereas you have realised that your own opinions added to the best of the maxims of the earlier great and famous pedagogues, will form a really splendid and certain method.

I have never met a more profound and deep-thinking woman—and I am quite sure that your very logical method and ideas when better known and fully understood will one day be acknowledged on all hands, and that your name will live throughout the ages side by side with Tausig, Leschetizky, Safonoff, Townshend, and others of the great teachers of the past and present.

One of the most striking features of your Lecture Course is the fact that the practical demonstrations of your own pupils (after all, this is the crucial test) far exceed even the already high expectations formed from your lectures preceding—in fact, a young child placed in your care is most evidently quite certain to be turned out a Pianist and Musician, which is a very different thing from the mere Musician turned out by so many teachers.

Your child pupils were nothing short of marvellous—from 7 years to 14 years—they were alike Pianists in the full and proper sense of the word—and even after only 12 months' training from you, they seemed to be in full and perfect command of the large grands which in every other way completely "swallowed them up."

In conclusion I take off my hat to a most charming personality—both as Musician, Pianist, and Thinker.

With my kindest regards and best wishes for all the success you so richly deserve. (Signed) HUBERT BROWN.

Birmingham.

"Invariably the pupils played with a technical confidence and a feeling for tone-colour that could only have sprung from the influence of a wise, directing mind."—Daily Telegraph, June 25th, 1928.

"Crisp, clean technique, which made it a joy to watch the little fingers and a delight to listen to for their exact and careful tone shading."—Musical Opinion, June, 1928.

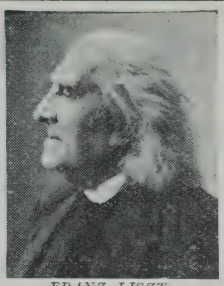
A really Good Pianist

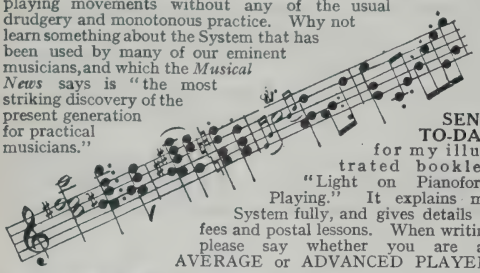
cannot be made by orthodox methods unless a special and rare gift exists already.



FRANZ LISZT

It has been pointed out with considerable show of reason that the real way to attain mastery over difficult passages is not to go over them until you are sick and tired of them, but to get your arm and hand muscles into the best state possible, a state approaching that exceptional muscular development with which virtuosi are endowed by Nature.

Let the "From Brain to Keyboard" System perfect every muscle and nerve in your hands and give you instant control over all playing movements without any of the usual drudgery and monotonous practice. Why not learn something about the System that has been used by many of our eminent musicians, and which the Musical News says is "the most striking discovery of the present generation for practical musicians."



SEND TO-DAY for my illustrated booklet, "Light on Pianoforte Playing." It explains my System fully, and gives details of fees and postal lessons. When writing please say whether you are an AVERAGE or ADVANCED PLAYER.

A NEW DEPARTURE FOR HEALTH AND VOICE

Ars Vivendi Breathing

With the majority, Ars Vivendi Breathing is out of the question through nasal congestion and blocking of the cranial sinuses. This must be dealt with before breathing is really started, otherwise strain results in fatigue. Tension is the enemy of vitality. Health loses its vigour, voice its bloom, and mind its power of concentration as strain grips the organism. This is the age of increasing tension, as shown in the growth of nervous ailments and of short-lived voices.

Ars Vivendi Methods are unique, forming a Comprehensive Technique of Manipulation to root of nose and nostrils, throat, and spine, accompanied with sound and other exercises to promote ease and flexibility of voice for speaking and singing.

PIANO PEDALS with Octave Coupler

This wonderful invention supersedes all Piano Pedals, and is a Master Patent.

St. George's Hall, Liverpool
9th April, 1921.

"The simplicity of the attachment, and the clever sixteen-feet, eight-feet, or both combined, 'OPTIONAL OCTAVE' contrivance astonished me.

"I was delighted with the Pedal touch and with the variety in that touch, which your Attachment makes possible. It is very responsive to the movements of the feet, and is reliable."

HERBERT F. ELLINGFORD, Mus. Bac., Oxon., F.R.C.O.

Owing to increased output, we have reduced the price of our Popular Model to 14 guineas cash. Deferred payments if desired.

OCTAVES

"The difference in the effect of octaves played in your way, compared with the old way, is remarkable."

The above is an extract from one of the hundreds of unsolicited letters of appreciation received from those who have studied THE CHARLES A. GILLETT METHOD OF "APPLIED WEIGHT TOUCH" based on THE REAL USE and PRACTICAL APPLICATION OF "CONTROLLED RELAXATION," in ALL phases of Pianoforte Technique.

An appreciation from a Teacher of the pianoforte :—

"What delights me most is that, though specialising in Piano Technique, you put it in its proper place, and use it only as a means of musical expression. It is evident that musical culture and refinement are before you all the time."

The Charles A. Gillett method may be successfully acquired by means of twelve lucid and practical Correspondence Lessons designed for home study and dealing with all phases of technique.

An appreciation from a MUS. BAC. DUNELM., F.T.C.L. :—

"Really I wish I had known of your system years before I did."

CHORALES

Harmonized by

J. S. BACH

Collected and arranged in melodic order by

H. ELLIOT BUTTON

THIS Collection of Chorales harmonized by Bach contains, it is believed, all those that he arranged for four voices. It includes also an index by means of which any Chorale can easily be found if the first few notes of the melody are known.

CHORALES

From the

Church Cantatas and Motets

Of

J. S. BACH

THIS Collection of Chorales is made with a view to various purposes. Primarily they may be used as short unaccompanied Motets or Anthems, or as choral items in an Organ Recital, especially in conjunction with Chorale Preludes on the tunes sung. The tunes themselves may serve as alternative settings to well-known hymns for special occasions.

PRESS NOTICES:

Observer.—"The new Bliss work has a great deal that is beautiful to listen to, and some interesting modernities for singers and players to compass. The linking-up of poems from different literary periods with instrumental movements is successful, and the whole work hangs properly together. It must be heard again soon."

Manchester Guardian.—"It was worth while missing the second act of 'The Mastersingers' in order to hear Arthur Bliss's new 'Pastoral' produced by the Harold Brooke Choir at the Bishopsgate Institute. The great compliment implied is by no means an exaggeration. Mr. Bliss is not a feverishly productive composer, but when he does bring out a new work nowadays one may be certain to find it interesting and hardly less sure to enjoy it. Last night these high expectations were more than justified, for the 'Pastoral' at once impressed itself on one's mind as the most refreshingly spontaneous and individually conceived musical novelty one has heard for some time. . . The whole text is a little bucolic anthology chosen with exquisite taste and . . . admirably unified by the music. The scoring . . . is like a fastidiously chosen and exactly appropriate binding. . . . It is possible to complain that in the declamatory sense the words are not entirely well set. In the wider poetical sense they could not have been treated more imaginatively or with greater charm and quickly responsive inventiveness. . . . The performance . . . usefully showed that an efficient small choir and a few players for the string parts are quite enough to do justice to this wholly delightful work."

The Times.—"There is a strength, a melodic beauty, and a complete individuality of idiom (if we except an obviously intentional compliment to Sir Edward Elgar, to whom the work is dedicated) which prove that the composer has now definitely found his feet. . . . Though less brilliant superficially than his earlier works, the 'Pastoral' is far more assured, and on that account never misses its effect. The choral writing is, in comparison with most modern works, remarkably straightforward."

Daily Mail.—"Nine or ten years ago Mr. Bliss was one of the young rebels of music. In the 'Pastoral' he is still vivacious, youthful, and unconventional enough—but in a way that will affright no one. The new work is extraordinarily attractive. The reapers sing boisterously, the naiads dreamily; echo discourages the love-lorn shepherd, and in 'The Pigeon Song' a flute adds charming decorations to a girl's amorous ditty. The composer's freshness and inventiveness well match the excellent verses."

Morning Post.—"The choral writing is in the true English tradition, and the musical idiom in general is entirely straightforward . . . The most sincere and musical expression of lyrical personality that I have heard from an English composer for a long time.

IN MUTUAL CONTEMPT

BY RUTLAND BOUGHTON

For the art of the actor I used to have great contempt. The prejudice was partly due to a puritanical upbringing, partly due to the writings of Gordon Craig, who, since I saw his production of Ibsen's 'The Vikings at Helgeland,' had seemed one of the great artists of the world.

However, in conversation with an actor some fifteen years ago, I learned the small regard he had for the mentality of musicians; my contempt for his sort received a salutary check, and I began to think out the matter for myself.

What are these music-makings and play-actings, and all the other arts of which we make such a fuss? Why must a civilization which is apparently entirely utilitarian be associated with sculpture in public places, picture galleries, public libraries, opera houses and theatres, orchestras under public control, and other such commercially unprofitable things?

Some of those institutions serve a partly, some a wholly, utilitarian purpose. The British Museum preserves data of commercial as well as of scientific and æsthetic value. Bournemouth's attachment to Sir Dan Godfrey and his fine orchestra has yielded satisfactory returns by attracting visitors and some part of the town's resident population—the desirable sort of people who pay well, and give little trouble on Bank Holidays.

Another less obvious but very useful function for the arts is in the subtle enforcement of a conservative philosophy upon the masses of the people. The sculptural effigies round which moves the traffic of our cities indicate the kind of character which, in the opinion of those who govern us, are most worthy of honour. Many pictures in the National Gallery help to prolong in the minds of the majority superstitions which have been outgrown by such mainstays of conservative thought as Lord Balfour and Mr. Kipling, and by a very considerable minority.

The theatres are frequented largely from force of habit and a desire to kill time, and are of all pretended artistic activities most palpably used for entirely commercial ends; but in the other instances I have cited a certain element of utility is also evident.

Nevertheless, there remains a large quantity of art which men respect even when they neither love nor understand it—art made by men who have held each other's work in such mutual contempt as I have instanced above; and it might be worth while more frequently to ask ourselves what our common public value really is.

We know that we generally chose our art because we preferred such work to the ordinary routine of industry or commerce; but it is not pleasant to feel that we may be contemptible, even to one another. The butcher does not despise the brain that is occupied with bread-making, nor the baker the skill that provides him with pork. Putting aside all possibilities of silly jealousies, therefore, may we not inquire if an actor and a musician may ever fairly arrive at a mean conception of each other's work?

Apart from our value to those who are clever enough to exploit us for pecuniary or political reasons, what is our real value to the public?

An accident of personal experience placed the musical and histrionic arts in the forefront of this argument; but as a matter of fact they are basic arts, from the dances of primitive religion to the performances of the Russian ballet and the goings-on in a jazz ballroom. Oscar Wilde wrote in his Foreword to 'The Picture of Dorian Gray,' 'From the point of view of form the type of all the arts is the art of the musician. From the point of view of feeling the actor's art is the type.'

That is true enough if we accept the limitations implied by the use of the word 'type,' but that sort of clever platitude will not take us very far. The inherent formativeness which Wilde proposed as typical of music is present also in good acting; the inherent feeling which enforces good acting enforces no less the pattern-schemes and language of music. But the argument is difficult and oblique so long as we compare the recreative art of the actor with a broad and vague idea of music which may refer either to the creative art of the composer or the recreative art of the executive musician. The composer and the playwright provide work which must have an emotional impetus, but they are primarily concerned with discovering for their ideas adequate and communicable form; it is the business of the executive musician and the actor to preserve that form while they reveal and retail the original impetus of the art-work—and that impetus is generally original in the real sense of the word, and existed before the creative artist struggled with it.

Wilde's statement is obviously true—to the extent that the skill of the (so-called) creative artist is acquirable in varying degrees by different dramatists and composers. However, craftsmanship, though the great part, is not the whole of their undertaking; though it was natural for Wilde to think so, as he himself was comparatively deficient in feeling. His plays were derived less from his bowels and his heart than from his brains.

Now whether the chief task of the artist is to provide form for his feelings and ideas, or to transmit feelings and ideas already suggested by another, his activity becomes subject to our judgment in two directions. Such activity will be admirable or contemptible according to the inherent nature of the art-work—according to its influence as a power for human welfare, and according to the thoroughness or carelessness which is expended upon its formation and revelation. Is the work directed towards the increase or the degradation of the general life? And is that increase or degradation effected with certainty and economy?

No one doubts that an artist is contemptible when he takes a cheap and easy way to his end. But perhaps in these days of mechanisation of the arts some people are beginning to doubt even that! Time is not so far behind us when everybody realised that a play or a symphony was the record of a psychological experience—outlined by the creative artist in so generalised a form that every separate performance by good artists was inevitably in some ways a new thing. Shakespeare thought it unnecessary to indicate his stage-action. Bach gave the very minimum of expression marks. Even the elaborate stage-directions of Shaw and the carefully-detailed directions in the music of Elgar leave a wide range to the imagination of the recreative artist. But those whose ideas of drama and music are gained chiefly from the movies and the gramophone may fail to realise one of the chief functions of those arts—their value in the kindling of a more vivid mental life: the fact that they leave so much to be completed by the executive artist that no two performances will be alike; while the executive artist, in his turn, if he thoroughly knows his job, will quicken the imagination of the onlooker or listener and yet leave a margin for them to work upon and fulfil according to their own various needs.

Without undervaluing the uses of mechanical reproduction to carry ideas of orchestral colour and special skill into remote places, and to add the reality of picture to the theory and abstraction conveyed by the printed word—without undervaluing those things, it would seem that the chief value of cinema-play and gramophone record will be appreciated mainly by those who are themselves engaged in the making of drama and music, whether professional or amateur. It is useful for actors to watch the methods of Charlie Chaplin, as it would be equally interesting to have records of the methods of Chaliapin or Edith Evans; but for a few types of humour to become standards for a world's laughter is to ensure that sooner or later the laughter itself will become mechanised. Then the audiences will grow dull and dumb, and finally laughter and applause will be provided in the right places by a talking machine, and wound off with the rest of the reel.

Similarly, it is good for chamber-music players to have records of the Léner and Flonzaley Quartets, that they may know what superb ensembles can do with certain works. But as no one wants to see the same cinema-play several times, so no one wants to hear the same gramophone record over and over again, even though the source of the work be Bach or Beethoven. That is probably one reason why the art of the cinema is so bad; and why gramophone records seem to be produced less to fulfil a public demand, and more to serve those commercial interests which have power to influence the gramophone companies.

This mechanical period of ours was preceded by that of professionalism. Machines are ousting all but the very greatest professionals, or those who can bring extra-musical pressure to bear upon the men who control the machines. These are but two stages of decadence. A vital people will not only reject the machines, but they will reject the professionals also, except in so far as machines and professionals prove the reality of their service. A vital people will want to make most of their art for themselves; and then they will not tolerate, even if they can conceive, identical or imitative performances.

Ignoring the mechanisation and the professionalism, therefore, and considering only the quality of the art, whether made by amateur or professional, whether directly or by mechanical transmission, we are still faced with those two questions regarding the honourable or contemptible nature of artistic activity.

For an actor to copy the tricks of Charlie Chaplin, to ape his mannerisms, or even to reproduce any of his own tricks which have been previously found effective, are signs of that cheap and easy method which is clearly contemptible.

Mannerism is part of an artist's personality, and can neither be dropped by him nor successfully assumed by anyone else. The thing which carries mannerism and all the rest of the business is good craftsmanship. All we can learn from Chaplin or the Léner people are the love and labour which have made their skill effective to convey jolly and exquisite things. The ineffective artist, amateur or professional, is contemptible because his skill is inadequate—either he is lazy or careless, or temperamentally and permanently unfitted for artistic activity.

But a man may be entirely efficient as a craftsman and yet contemptible if the nature of the work upon which he is engaged is voluntary and tends to the degradation of life. However, let us be quite clear as to what we mean by degradation. It is not necessarily degrading to deal with evil things. Cruelty and treachery, war and murder, filth and snobbery, are ever-present in life, and therefore prime material for art. To present them as things to be condoned is clearly to propagate a decadent influence. To fail to present them at all is clearly as bad. Art which is concerned only with what is beautiful and virtuous soon grows romantic and false. To present abominable things at their worst, to show man withstanding them and, if possible, overcoming them, is clearly to add to the ascensive part of life. Even to show man succumbing to evil things (as Siegfried to the spear of Hagen) may add power to human virtue if the nature of the evil is not cloaked.

The art of Aubrey Beardsley may well be admired for its superb technique ; but the nasty feeling which pervades it is developed, not for our condemnation, but that we may admire the completed art-work. Beardsley's art, therefore, became contemptible.

The art of Stravinsky is contemptible both in its technique and its purpose. In his more elaborate works the man's indifference to any attempt at fine craftsmanship is obscured by reason of the glowing colours of the orchestral palette—colours not provided by himself but by the real creators of the orchestra from Haydn to Strauss, and by those seldom-mentioned but all-important men, the makers of musical instruments—the makers, not the men whose shop-names are generally associated with the instruments. Their interest is almost entirely a commercial interest in these days.

Stravinsky, in his least pretentious works, shows that he is entirely unable to formulate a musical idea of his own. As a member of a savage orchestra he might perhaps be allowed to play a recurrent rhythm upon a drum—as the only evidence of real form in his work is that kind of primitive repetition which birds and babies also do very well.

And if his technique is contemptible, the original impulse of his activity is even more so. His larger noises (' The Fire Bird,' ' Petrouchka,' ' Sacre de Printemps ') illustrate the most feeble kind of romanticism. Wagner took legends, but he charged them with a modern meaning. Wagner took figures of gods and made us more in love with human beings. Stravinsky diverts the natural flow of sympathy from human beings to puppets. Wagner built up a real world in real action ; Stravinsky rages in an inverted and bestial Utopia of primitivism. His lesser noises also proclaim his nastiness, as when he thinks that humourless words about bugs make a suitable song for children.

Stravinsky stands at the head of a movement which interprets much that is real and rotten in the modern world ; he endeavours to disguise the rottenness, and leaves it the more desperate.

The art of George Frederick Watts is despised, and rightly despised, for its sentimentality ; its sentimentality weakens its purpose and value. It is also despised by some highly-skilled painters by reason of a defective technique. That may be ; I am not skilled in draughtmanship ; all I know is that some of Watts's pictures cause the human mind to exert itself in directions which are not to the general disadvantage. If a better technique would have stimulated a higher exertion, it is a pity that Watts could not or did not win it. If we condemn him for that defect the fact still remains that his pictures have an integrity which adds something to life. Better many such second-rate artists than one Beardsley.

The art of Wagner is despised by certain fastidious musicians whose lofty artistic principles assert the wrongfulness of associating the arts of music and drama. There are things in Wagner which it is not difficult to condemn ; but because he, even more than Watts, has quickened the vitality of men, his work is not contemptible in spite of its defects and in spite of the high principles of his critics.

It is easy for a specialist to condemn the world. He lives in his little hole, and for him the world is right or wrong as it crowds to him with, or withholds from him, supplies and admiration. Most musicians are inevitably brought up as specialists.

A STUDY OF FRANZ LISZT—II.

By Alexander Brent-Smith

When we turn from discussing his matter and examine his methods and manner, we are left in no doubt that Liszt had an immense influence upon the history of music. Indeed, every earnest new man of forty years ago felt that Liszt's innovations were the solution of all symphonic problems, arguing that the tone-poem offered the composer such freedom, both in form and development, that in competition with it the classical symphony would inevitably die. Since then, however, composers have gradually discovered that the so-called freedom of the tone-poem was a delusion, and that there is something more in the old classical form than they, in their first enthusiasm for the new form, had imagined. The symphonic poem certainly does give the composer a great deal of freedom, but it is not a freedom altogether satisfactory. The poetic idea of the programme may limit his musical liberty rather than promote it. For instance, suppose a composer is inspired to write a poem on the career of Napoleon. In many ways it offers splendid scope for working out big ideas. Let us suppose he has found his musical theme which fits the character of Napoleon. It may happen in the course of brooding over this theme that he finds it possesses many developments which are not covered by the character or exploits of Napoleon. He may find that the theme when altered in mode and tempo becomes an exquisitely tender little minuet. Now either he has to forfeit his own musical idea or else he has to make Napoleon dance a minuet, not an altogether impossible situation, but one which reveals the inherent weakness of the tone-poem form. From the old symphonic form such programmatic inconveniences are absent. The composer has no tiresome guide in whose footsteps he must dutifully place his own. In other words, in spite of its restrictions the classical form offers the composer more musical freedom than the symphonic poem.

Again, the composer is not absolutely free in his choice of poem or subject. Music demands that there shall be occasions for development of themes, and the only means of developing a theme is by some form of repetition. In music there is no way of referring to or developing an idea except by quotation. In a poem the development of ideas can be carried on without any re-statement of those ideas, because the hearer's mind retains the subject and applies the new words and thoughts by unconscious reference. I can, for instance, write a poem on Immortality without ever repeating the word, simply casting fresh ideas and similes over the initial idea. In music this is impossible; therefore, unless the composer entirely eschews development (as in the Chromatic Fantasy of Bach), a scheme not likely to succeed on a large scale, he must select a subject which promotes musical development, preferably those subjects which display marked changes of fortune—the struggle and triumph of Tasso; Mazeppa's terrible afflictions and ultimate glorification; Prometheus, his trial and triumph; the development of the soul from 'crepuscular, invertebrate state of Karma-less humanity' into a triumphant personality. In each poem it will be found that the subject allows the music the very development it requires, and in fact would have received, in the ordinary classical form. Actually, the symphonic poem is most successful when it approximates to the accepted form of the symphony, retaining to itself the artistic license to reject or retain such features as the music seems to demand. The value of a poetic idea behind music is, as Beethoven found in his symphonies and sonatas, to drive the music out of mechanical developments—mere exploitations of traditional methods, now a fugue, now an inversion, now an augmentation. In thus emphasising the necessity of avoiding mere pattern-making Liszt was doing music a very valuable service.

It seems a cruel trick of Fate to deny to the larger works of Liszt that immortality which he so earnestly craved for them. Like Landor he thought his time would come, but the years roll by and his entry into Valhalla seems still as far away as ever. And yet, what of those rhapsodies constantly recurring in programmes, pianistic and orchestral, those studies, and those transcriptions? Are not these enough to keep his memory green? It is true that they are not so profound as the symphonic poems would wish to be, nor are they the voicing of ethics or dogma as the sacred work would wish to be, but they are something which the world would miss if they had not been written. As I have said previously, Liszt's technique in his pianoforte works was, as it were, an x-powered engine for ever bursting into high speed. Now high-powered engines are not for everyone, nor for every occasion. In fact, on the high road they are a nuisance, and merely an opportunity for the thoughtlessness of the foolish. But is there not a real use and a real value for such capacity? Is there not something splendid in the sight of a machine roaring round the track at three-figure speeds? Is not the demonstration of the extreme capacity of the human mind or body of considerable value to us generally, even if it be only to know that it is possible to walk over Niagara on a tight-rope, or that a man can strike a billiard-ball repeatedly with any desired fraction of force.

Now Liszt's tours de force exhibit the highest point attainable by human skill in the control and manipulation of the fingers. Rarely, if ever, is it possible to see in detail the muscular and mental co-ordination of the abnormally gifted in any particular branch of learning and skill. Not even the slow-motion film can reveal the perfection of muscular control which makes a Bobby Jones or a Laurie Doherty. But in these compositions of Liszt's we can see exactly what a supreme giant of the pianoforte has to do and can do. To level against these works the cheap sneer of 'show-piece' is to admit a dulled perception. The man who plays the trumpery rubbish of Brinley Richards, with its garnishment of scales and arpeggios, is indeed showing off because he is simply doing a very easy thing to astonish the ignorant and foolish. But the pianist who plays a Fantasy or a study of Liszt's is a superman using a type of skill which is only possible to one or two in each generation.

In the closing movement of the E flat Concerto there is a continuous flow of really well-written music in which the standard of technique never falls to the normal, and yet there is no suggestion of fireworks, because the difficulties, great as they are, are part and parcel of the texture. Again, there is no showing-off in 'Feux Follets'; but if anyone wishes to measure his skill with the Giants of the Pianoforte, all he has to do is to attempt the opening pages of this study. He will soon realise that his fingers are, muscularly, totally incapable even of playing the principal theme, much less of giving it the necessary alterations in power. Or let him attempt to play any page of 'La Muette de Portici' or 'Don Juan.' Here the greatest difficulties lie not so much in the obviously difficult passages (though heaven preserve any student from the horrors of the threefold chromatic cadenza in 'La Muette'), but in the ordinary exposition of the music which Liszt evidently regarded as a normal level of skill.

Of the Twelve Studies, only two are born to undoubted greatness. In some of them the material is so poor that they cannot bear the strain of the technique, but 'Mazeppa' and 'Feux Follets' are of outstanding merit, and the last word in the exploitation of strength and dexterity. Of the Fantasies it can be said, 'the better the material the better the work.' When he chose such a subject as Mozart's

'Don Juan,' the melodic invention and the treatment combine to produce a unique piece of pianoforte music. So also in some of his transcriptions of Schubert's songs, notably in the 'Erl-king,' Liszt has given the world pianoforte pieces which, by means of his prodigious technique, express without words the dramatic value of the poems. In some ways Liszt's transcription of the 'Erl-king' improves on the original. The horse gallops faster than Schubert's (in fact, Schubert's original horse did not gallop—it trotted very fast), and the Erl-king, when he appears, has no tangible body as in the song, but is a ghostly apparition seen in the drifting mist. Nothing else but the most delicate skill in playing those large, luminous chords could have conjured up this lovely yet terrifying wraith which floated round the benighted travellers. Here is the justification of the technique which Liszt set as a standard for future pianists.

Can it be said, then, that Liszt has failed to leave an imperishable legacy as a composer? Even if his important instrumental and choral works meet with only occasional performances, they have had an influence upon history which cannot be ignored. And after all, is it not right and proper that it should be through his first (and lasting) Love, the Pianoforte, that he should have given to music the fruits of his genius—a genius which the world had never known before and which in all probability the world will never know again.

THE POSSIBILITY OF QUARTER-TONE AND OTHER NEW SCALES

By Leonid Sabaneev

The idea of ultrachromaticism, or music written for certain new scales containing more notes to the octave than the current European tempered scale, is quite an old one. The first ultrachromaticists (they were simply called 'chromaticists' in those days) belonged to the 16th century; their names were Vicentino and Gesualdo, Prince of Venosa, and about the year 1650 they constructed an instrument with twenty-two notes to the octave, and also tried to formulate the theory of this new musical plane, and to compose for it.

Subsequently the idea, which had proved unsuccessful, was thrust entirely into the background, owing to the grandiose and fruitful development of the 12-degree scale. It was revived in the 19th century, one of its champions being Prince Odoevsky (a Russian theorist and writer on music), who also built an instrument with the natural pitch, and which is still preserved in the museum of the Moscow Conservatory.

The ultrachromaticism of the 19th century presents a different aspect from that of its 16th-century predecessor. In its perspective a great part is played by the recognition of the fact that the old scale is exhausted, that musical creative work needs to be freshened up and to find new resources. The nearer we approach to the beginning of the 20th century, the more numerous become the attempts to penetrate, theoretically and practically, into this new musical world. On the eve of the great war the gifted pianist and mediocre composer, Ferruccio Busoni, wrote a small pamphlet entitled 'The Bases of the new Musical Æsthetics,' in which he endeavoured, in a naïve and amateurish way, to establish the necessity for the introduction of quarter- and tertia-tones. Simultaneously there appeared numerous works on the theory of this question, especially in Russia, where, in addition to the present writer—then a staunch adherent of the idea—Prof. Rozenov, Arseny Avramov, and others, devoted much attention to it.

The first practical steps were also taken by Russia, but I cannot boast of their success. In 1908, A. Lourié, then a little-known futurist composer, but afterwards famous for his activity as Minister of Music in the early Communist period, wrote several things in quarter-tones. In those ingenuous days—when it was so simple and easy to overturn the old foundations, and when it seemed that genius in music was reduced to an ability to invent something sensational—there was no difficulty in believing that the music of the new ultrachromatic sphere would develop of itself, providing a method of recording quarter-tones could be found. But life and practical creative work dealt somewhat severely with these naïve attempts.

In the years immediately preceding the war better organized efforts to write quarter-tonal music were made. The pioneer was Haba, the Hungarian musician. As is always the case in this sphere, two problems of a practical nature were encountered—the problems of a notation and an instrument. In Russia and Germany, where the subject was treated seriously and scientifically, there arose further inevitable questions as to what, strictly speaking, this new tonal scheme should be. Should it be created on the principle of a simple doubling or trebling of the existing notes by the mechanical subdivision of the intervals of the 12-degree scale into two or three parts? Or should it be based on a theoretical system of notes more acoustically accurate? Should a system of pure tones, acoustically absolute, be created, or would it be necessary to have recourse to some new, more exact temperament? The problem was expanded and became intricate. It was clear that there existed, actually or in anticipation, not one ultrachromatic music, but a whole collection of various sects of ultrachromaticism, which were even then in a state of war amongst themselves. So far, not a single instrument capable of realising these theories had been constructed, not a single bar of the new music had been created, and already the theorists were fighting for the purity of their views, and maintaining the soundness of their creeds.

The main lines of musical thought on the subject were laid down at this time. One school, which might be characterised as the 'acoustically-archaic,' saw as the chief feature of the problem of ultrachromaticism the principle of a return to absolute purity of intonation—a purity destroyed by temperament, which had introduced a consistently false scale. Its members considered their ear to be so sensitive that the 12-degree music must seem to them a continuous discord. It follows as a matter of course that thinkers of this type had no inclination for temperament, even had it been more delicate, but preferred an acoustically pure and exact system.

Others, on the contrary, set out with the idea of enriching the resources of music by new possibilities. This might be termed the 'modernist' school. Its adherents found that the musical tissue was continually becoming more refined and the harmonic world richer, and that the time had arrived when the existing twelve notes were insufficient to express the exquisite and subtle shades of musical thought. The starting-points of these schools differed essentially. The first group was, in the main, reactionary, the second progressive. The latter was less exacting in respect of temperament and accuracy, and was inclined for temperaments of various, but more delicate, types, the most popular being acoustic temperaments of 53, 43, 31, and even 19 degrees, as well as those obtained by subdividing the existing semitones (i.e., 24-, 36-, and 48-degree temperaments).

The problem, as I have already remarked, has invariably been faced with two purely technical difficulties—the construction of an instrument capable of producing these subtle shades of intonation and of keeping them up to pitch; and the invention of a system of recording them, and, moreover, a system which shall be sufficiently intelligible and easily read. Human genius has usually started by inventing a notation and a means of gradually perfecting the instruments, and then has created the theory, but in the history of ultrachromaticism the process had been reversed. It may be owing to this that we have hitherto attained no practical results, though there are a number of other difficulties.

No solution has yet been found for these problems. We do not even know what the fate of ultrachromaticism will be. The question of a record is perhaps not so complex, and in any case it is always possible to create a system of signs, but when we come to the instrument we are confronted with a more difficult business. It is indispensable that the ultrachromatic instrument shall have a constant pitch—in other words, it must be of the keyboard type; unless it is, the human musical mind will hardly be able to orientate itself in the new tonal spaces. The development of the 12-degree temperament could not have been accomplished apart from the construction of the organ and the clavecin, which enabled the human ear to recognise the nature of chords. The ultrachromatic instrument must satisfy a number of requirements, which may be formulated as follows:

1. It must be keyed, so that every note may be fixed;
2. It must be polyphonic, i.e., capable of sounding chords;
3. It must keep its pitch;
4. Its technique must not be immoderately difficult; the abundance of new keys and notes will be embarrassing enough as it is;
5. It must have an agreeable timbre.

It is very evident that the fulfilment of these conditions is no easy task. No existing instrument satisfies them. It would also be a difficult matter to construct an instrument of a previous type—such as the organ, the harmonium, the pianoforte, and the polychord—which should permit of extended scale possibilities. Of these types the harmonium, though capable of maintaining a delicate pitch, has a comparatively unpleasant timbre. The organ is more suitable, but is extremely cumbersome; the pianoforte shares with a stringed instrument of the polychord type the inability to keep its pitch. On the whole, the organ seems to be best fitted to give bodily form to the problem of ultrachromaticism.

In view of all these obstacles, the theorists turned to the new scientific methods of sound-production, to electrical sound-waves obtained from the interference of contours (Theremin's system), to the gramophone, and so forth. But the resultant timbres were rather disagreeable, and furthermore lacked the most essential quality—stability of intonation, reliable to so small an interval as a comma.

Whilst the theorists were occupied with their researches, the more direct and naïve people were busily engaged in composing music and adapting instruments. The experiments of Haba and Vishnegradsky in this respect are most worthy of attention. They constructed instruments (of the pianoforte and harmonium type) and wrote compositions for them, as well as for string ensemble, relying on the fact that quarter-tones are feasible on the fiddle. Nevertheless, the impression conveyed by all these experiments and devices is that they are curiously foreign to the general stream of music, are outside musical territory, so to speak, and hence are unnecessary. It is, however, worth our while to devote a little time to their consideration.

The ultrachromaticists have often given practical demonstration that it is possible on any tonal plane—even the most subtle and delicate—to write very untalented and uninteresting music, just as possible as it is to create works of genius on the archaic pentatonic scale. The tonal plane, the abundance of tones, is of itself no guarantee of the quality of the music. I have heard these ultrachromatic experiments many times, and they have always impressed me as stillborn.

Moreover, I have never felt that they revealed new perspectives, or originated a new era. I can confidently assert that my ear has never received this music as something 'different,' created on 'different tonal planes,' but as the old music out of tune. In fact, the new intervals are not accepted as such by our ear, which has been trained in a definite direction, but are brought into conformity with the familiar intervals of the 12-degree or diatonic scale. An interval less than an octave or greater than a seventh sounds to us like an octave or a seventh out of tune, and not like a new, independent interval. The case is similar with all the other 'new' intervals. We are not directly conscious of them; habit makes us refer them to the previous tonal world, as distortions of the sounds with which we are familiar. And in so far as we bear within us the whole burden of the inheritance of our tonal culture, the creation of the ages—and we cannot rid ourselves of this burden without ceasing to be cultured, without discarding the whole of our heritage of culture and becoming savages again in a tonal respect—we shall always be obliged to adopt this attitude to the new resonances.

We know that our ear has the faculty of the psychological corrective. We hear one thing and feel or are conscious of it as something else. The accuracy of intonation in our musical performances is often approximate, the expressional and casual deviations from purity frequently exceeding two and even three commas. Furthermore, measurements made by me at the Academy of the Art Sciences, Moscow, showed that every sound—by which I mean a musical and not an acoustic sound—has a certain breadth; it is never an isolated sound of an exact pitch, with a definite number of vibrations, but a more or less compact group of sounds having an approximately similar number of vibrations. A sound which, acoustically, is absolutely pure is to us simply unpleasant, smacking of the dry and the abstract. It appeared from my measurements that with singers the breadth of a note is often as much as a semitone. Our ear orientates these notes, and refers them to a certain centre, a certain pitch, being guided therein by the structure of the musical tissue. One and the same note will seem to us to vary in pitch according to the context in which it is presented to us.

Consequently, in order that we may be able to receive these new notes in their new positions, hitherto unknown to musical culture, we must weave the musical tissue on entirely new and different principles, and thereby demolish the outlook on music which has existed for ages. But the modern ultrachromatic composers do not do this. Haba writes academic music with quarter-tones tacked on to it, which does not in any way make it more modern. Vishnegradsky's compositions are sometimes academic, sometimes in the Scriabin style, but in both cases the construction of the musical whole is borrowed from the past, and our mind, in following this music, involuntarily thinks of it in connection with what has gone before. And it cannot be otherwise.

In the first place there is the physical aspect, from which there is no getting away. The semitone is the 'inter-atomic interval' of the musical material, so to speak. Everyone knows very well that it is not a pure interval but an average quantity, easily recognisable by the average ear. Any narrower interval appeals to the exceptional ear, just as a system constructed on the wider intervals—such as the old pentatonic scale—was based on the less sensitive ear. It is precisely this mean or average distinguishable quantity that enables us to tolerate and re-tune by our inner ear the large acoustical inaccuracy with which we are presented at nearly every musical performance, especially by the orchestra and the vocalist.

In art—no matter what it be—the optimum is always the important thing, and not the maximum, and this applies equally to the number of sounds. Historically, how was it contrived that the semitone should remain the musical 'atom'? Could it have been mere chance? It is more probable that, as an organic phenomenon, it became the minimum interval, not because nobody imagined any other, but because it is the optimum in this case. Every pitch is potentially included in music. Nevertheless, it has never made use of all of them, but has always selected from them a tonal plane on which to project itself. Thereby the chaos of unorganized pitches is differentiated from the scale, from the cosmos of orderly arrangement. Possibly the inclusion of new pitches, instead of providing fresh resources for the cosmos, will merely bring music nearer to chaos.

The other considerations are of the historical order. The musical plane is analogous to the spoken language. Both of them undergo changes, but these changes can never be sudden, and still less can they be premeditated and theoretically constructed. It is impossible to 'compose' a language and compel us to talk it. In the best case it would be an Esperanto, which wants to be a world-language, but is, in fact, only the language of a little group of people who study it out of curiosity. Nor is it possible to construct a musical tongue, a new musical plane. It alone can shape itself in the process of prolonged historical mutations. But the further we go, the less probable does it become for our European culture. We see that now in particular the sphere of language undergoes less alteration than any other. Its changes took place considerably earlier, when culture was being developed; as soon as that was accomplished, language became fixed, established, stabilised. And the musical language was also stabilised. Too many precious things have been created in it to permit of our parting from it so lightly. Music especially lives by being performed, and hence it is not merely a question of composing a new species of music, but also of creating absolutely new cadres of absolutely new performers. The individual manifestations of musical culture are closely and inseparably interwoven—it is impossible to confine oneself to composition alone—and performance needs to be recognised; these new instruments and new players, this new music, have to struggle for existence in open competition with their rivals in the field of art. And if we consider the matter seriously we shall see that the chances of survival are poor: the new compositions are more complex and less accessible; the instruments, too, are more difficult, their construction is expensive, and their technique fatiguing. The ultrachromatic music threatens to become nothing more than Esperanto—the language of a few hundred people, and moreover merely supplementary to the original, native tongues. The European has his own music, his own musical plane, to which cultured thought will always return. When we have ceased to be Europeans, and have reverted to barbarism and forgotten the culture of the past, it may be possible to erect some new thing—ultrachromaticism, let us suppose—on the space left vacant. People of other races may do it when they come to replace the European culture. Again, it is hardly probable that they will adopt the ultrachromatic language; they are more likely to begin everything from the beginning, as the Europeans did. Ultrachromaticism no longer seems to me an organic possibility of culture, a stage in its inevitable development, as temperament undoubtedly was; it is an artificial excrescence of civilization, an invention, which may have some vogue and notoriety as a curiosity but not as an organic phenomenon. It is merely another symptom of the twilight of our era.

In the best and most favourable case for the idea of ultrachromaticism its course must be altogether different from that which it has hitherto followed in practice. Ultrachromaticism introduces a new tonal plane, and it must first of all orientate itself therein and show others how to do so. To achieve this creatively, the whole attention must be concentrated on the task. In the history of art, any complication in one sphere is inevitably accompanied by a simplification in the others, in order that the attention may be directed wholly to the former. With the development of counterpoint tunes became simpler, the melodies of the chorales were hardened, so that the study of the harmony might be more possible. When (in the Florentine era) melody was developed, the process was reversed—polyphony disappeared, having been reduced and converted into a harmonic accompaniment: the centre of interest was transferred to melody and its expressiveness. In the 19th century it was the turn of harmony, and rhythm and melody lagged far behind. Nowadays the interest in rhythm has obscured harmony and melody, and even music itself. If ultrachromaticism were an organic phenomenon it would have to devote its whole attention to the new, ultrachromatic melody. It must pass through the same stages as our music—first melody, then polyphony, then the synthesis of melody and harmony. This problem introduces to our musical consciousness a series of new and most complex phenomena. By way of compensation it should simplify all the rest as far as possible. Ultrachromatic music should become monodic, or almost so, with a minimum of accompaniment; only then can it gradually enter into the comprehension of the musical masses. But our ultrachromaticism wants to 'kill all the hares' off-hand—to create simultaneously a new plane and in it the most complex harmony and rhythm in the whole of musical history. History is not made suddenly. Our senses cannot grasp such a collection of novelties and complexities all at once; given time, it has a chance of being recognised as an organism.

Hence it seems to me that these seekers have taken the wrong course. They ought to have concentrated their forces on the creation of the new ultrachromatic melody, and reduced everything else to a state of primitive simplicity, as music did in bygone days when homophony came into being. And the ability to create works of genius is also needed—but this is not so easy, since the creation of melody is a most mysterious and incomprehensible process, and most difficult of attainment by contemporary composers, as we all know very well.

'A RACE APART': OUR BERLIOZ EXCLUSIVES

The Daily Telegraph of April 27 contained an article by Mr. Constant Lambert entitled 'The Isolation of Berlioz: Academic Criticism.' His main point was one that (he says) has been overlooked by the participants in the recent discussion—namely, that Berlioz was 'the one great romantic composer whose work stands completely outside the German tradition.' The result is (he argues) that critics have made the mistake of judging Berlioz by the standard and methods of the German tradition. But will this contention hold? Surely no critic worth his salt has ever found fault with the French composer for not adopting the harmonic and melodic methods of Beethoven, Schubert, or Brahms. I may return to this point presently.

First let me touch on what strikes me as being the weak plank in the platform of the more fervid Berliozians. Mr. Lambert says that the controversy has been 'entertaining.' I would even apply the term 'amusing' to his naïve classification of the critics. According to this, you must be either 'pro' or 'anti,' swallowing your Berlioz whole or not at all. And if you do the swallowing, you do it by a kind of divine right. This is a state of things that holds good with no other composer. I do not agree that it is true of Berlioz. If it were, it would merely prove that he was anything but a great composer, for one of the signs of supreme genius is universality of appeal.

In this theory of exclusiveness, Mr. Lambert merely follows Mr. Cecil Gray, who in his generally excellent and always stimulating 'History of Music' says, astoundingly:

> 'Although Berlioz is the object of a cult, it is one which, unlike most other cults, is entirely devoid of preciosity. Further, his worshippers make no propaganda on his behalf. [What, never?] Like the Druses, they are a race apart; they do not seek to make converts, because they do not want them. You are either one of them or you are not. Either you receive at once, from the very first work of his that you hear, a thrill akin to an electric shock, or else you are completely insulated and rendered for ever immune by a pachydermatous rubber hide of indifference or distaste.'

How clean contrary this is to fact will be obvious to every normal musician. Bless the innocent hearts of the musical Druses! We alleged 'anti's' had our electric shock from Berlioz, and were enjoying the Overtures, the plums from 'Faust' and the 'Trojans,' and the purple patches in the 'Fantastic' Symphony, when these young 'discoverers' of the composer were running round in short pants. And we still enjoy them. If we take no pleasure in a good deal of the rest of Berlioz it is for the plain, brutal reason that we find it patchy in interest, with the balance on the side of dullness.

Both Mr. Lambert and Mr. Gray explain elaborately the grounds on which they claim that Berlioz was 'first and foremost a melodist.' Mr. Gray quotes a French critic to the effect that Berlioz's phrases 'most frequently consist of twelve, sixteen, eighteen, or twenty bars, while with Wagner, for example, phrases of eight bars are rare, those of four most common, those of two still more so, and those of one bar are most frequent of all.' [But why confuse melodies with motifs?] Berlioz's melodies are, in his own words, often on so large a scale that 'an immature or short-sighted musical vision may not clearly distinguish their form—shallow musicians [such as the 'anti's'] may find them so unlike the funny little things they call melodies that they cannot bring themselves to give the same name to both.'

Mr. Lambert champions Berlioz as a melodist on different grounds:

> 'Melody and even counterpoint are very largely based on a solid ground of accepted chord progressions. This trait can be clearly seen in many of the minor pieces (valses, &c.) of Schubert, which are little else but elaborated chords with no independent thematic value whatsoever.
> 'But with Berlioz the harmonic thought is never allowed to cramp or dominate the thematic outline, and that is what his admirers mean when they claim that Berlioz is first and foremost a melodist. The themes may not be of the kind that the average man wants to sing in his bath or in Wembley Stadium, but without doubt they are primarily tunes, and their wayward and expressive line refuses to be fettered by any harmonic formula or by the rhythmic squareness of the folk-dance. When Berlioz uses a descending chromatic phrase in one of his themes he is not, like Delius, allowing the melodic line to follow meekly a harmonic sequence, nor, like Strauss, is he merely sliding from one position of a chord to another. He is actually using each degree of the scale for its expressive significance.'

But all these measurements and special pleadings go for little against the fact that Wagner wrote many melodies that have become current coin among the musical public the world over, whereas Berlioz has given us—how many? Most of us can whistle only one—the Rakoczy March, and that is not by Berlioz.

Now, all the great composers (except of course the vocal polyphonists) have been tune-writers, and it would be easy to name a dozen (a mere dozen! say, rather, a hundred) fine tunes written by every one of them, from Bach to Elgar—tunes whose fineness needs no subtle explanation or examination with a foot-rule; you can't miss it, as so many experienced musicians somehow seem to have missed it in all but a very few of the tunes of Berlioz.

At the recent performance of 'Faust' at Queen's Hall, the magic of the dances of the Sylphs and the Will-o'-the-Wisps, the never-failing stir of the March, and the originality of the scoring in countless passages must have delighted everybody. But it is no less likely that almost as many were staggered and bored by the feebleness of the vocal solo-writing as a whole—the very department, surely, where a composer who is 'first and foremost a melodist' might be expected to shine. Let the open-minded reader turn up, say, Faust's 'Farewell, thou lovely night' (p. 231 of the Novello vocal score), or Margaret's Romance 'Alone and heavy-hearted' (p. 249), or Faust's 'Oh come, calm-breathing twilight' (p. 181). Let him examine both the vocal line and the harmony, and if he doesn't find them as a whole remarkably undistinguished—even commonplace—for a composer of Berlioz's rank, I shall be surprised.

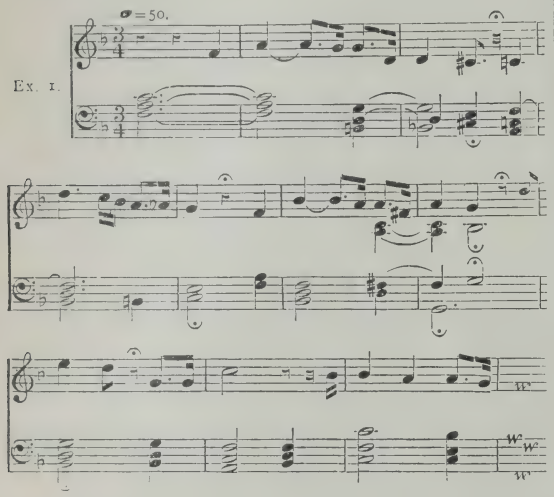
Apropos of the harmony: Mr. Lambert brings up the old argument about trying Berlioz's chordal progressions on the pianoforte. Does he really think that Ravel and the other adverse critics of Berlioz's harmony are dependent on the pianoforte for their estimate of this side of the composer?

Turn again to 'Faust.' (I use this work for reference because so many readers have a vocal score handy.) Berlioz's orchestration worked magic, we know; but even it could not transmute into gold the base metal of such passages as the introduction to the Romance mentioned above:

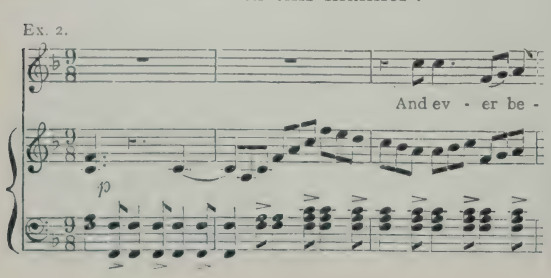
Ex. 1.

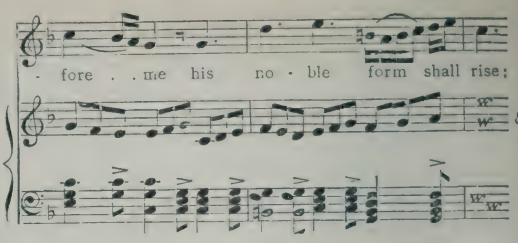


Nor could it make the modulations in the 'Invocation to Nature' other than clumsy and conventional. In fact, I can never hear this number without being reminded of an adventurous harmony-pupil let loose for the first time among the joys of diminished triads and augmented sixths.

I don't quote from the Invocation, because there is no representative passage short enough. Instead, I give one more example of the strange streak of commonplace that crops up so often in Berlioz. It occurs in the Romance, at the words, 'And ever before me his noble form will rise.' What could have possessed Berlioz to make him fall down in this manner:

Ex. 2.





This was one of the fairly large number of passages that, during the Queen's Hall performance, produced in me, and probably in others, a mixture of irritation and amusement. I could hardly believe my ears, and found myself paraphrasing Blake, and asking, 'Did he who wrote the "Sylphs' Dance" write thee?'

As to the counterpoint of Berlioz, Mr. Gray (not without apparent effort) goes so far as to admit that there is something in the adverse criticism on this score; he then stiffens himself, and adds that the reproach doesn't carry much weight to-day when counterpoint is no longer the staple. Moreover, Berlioz, he says, had no particular use for it.

It is a pity that the student Berlioz was not made to realise that the study of counterpoint does not aim solely at enabling a composer to write polyphony. Hardly less important is the harmonic sureness and facility it imparts. Most experienced teachers of composition will agree that the clumsiness of Berlioz's harmony (which his devotees try to exalt into a virtue) is a technical weakness due largely to his poor contrapuntal training.

To come back to Mr. Lambert's main contention. He divides musicians into two bodies: the elect, who gulp down their Berlioz whole, and the rest of us. Us, the mere outsiders, he further subdivides into (a) pedants, who measure the French composer by the Teutonic bushel and find him filling a mere half-pint, and (b) the 'far more solid anti-Berlioz phalanx provided by the modern English school of neo-Elizabethans and folk-song pasticheurs, whose productions are about as reminiscent of the full-blooded spirit of Elizabethan times as a Tudor lounge in a super-cinema!'

I have tried hard, but I can't square this with Mr. Gray's theory (presumably endorsed by Mr. Lambert) that we are Berliozians or the reverse willy-nilly, either receiving from our first hearing of his music an electric thrill, or else being completely insulated and rendered for ever immune—mere outsiders, in fact. If there is anything in this theory of appreciation by predestination, why abuse those of us who had not the good luck to be on the spot when the Berlioz gland was being served out? The Elect should pity us, instead of calling us names—pedants, thin-blooded folk-song pasticheurs, and pachyderms.

Mr. Lambert is mistaken. There is no anti-Berlioz faction. Those of us whom he labels as such will go on enjoying the things in Berlioz we have always enjoyed, happy to add to their number when performances of his neglected works reveal them to us. Meanwhile, let the Berlioz exclusives continue to maintain that the king can do no wrong. The average musician will go on exercising his right of private judgment, refusing to be led by the nose.

Finally, here is a sporting offer in connection with the melodic question. It occurs to me that perhaps the failure of the Berliozians to give us examples of his genius as a tune-writer is due to the difficulty of using sufficient music-type illustrations in books and articles. If this be so, I am glad to be able to give them a chance to put things right. The Editor of the Musical Times, being himself interested in this discussion, kindly authorises me to place at their disposal the space equal to at least three pages for musical quotations if one of them will contribute an article on the melodic side of Berlioz's genius. This offer is made seriously and in good faith. I join the Editor in the hope and belief that it will produce a solid and valuable contribution to a dispute that has hitherto been, as Mr. Lambert says, 'entertaining,' but too vague and purely contentious to be of much use.

THE EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF ARTS

By Arthur T. Froggatt

In a review of the hundred and fifty-sixth exhibition of the Royal Academy of Arts (vide the Musical Times, July, 1924), the following sentence occurs: 'As regards the number of works, not to mention their importance from a musical point of view, it can hardly be said that the divine art receives its due share of recognition from modern painters and sculptors—not such a share as would be observable, I feel sure, in an exhibition of the works of the Old Masters.' In that year the proportion of musical subjects was one in sixty-five. In the present exhibition it is less than one in sixty. On the other hand, in the recent exhibition of Old Dutch Masters, it was about one in twenty-three.

On entering Gallery No. 1, my search was instantly rewarded by 'Lady at the Piano—Miss Ethel Bartlett' (2), by Harold Knight. A portrait, and at the same time an interior, carefully painted, and delightful from every point of view. But alas! I had to go far before I was able to discover the faintest suggestion of music in 'Twilight in Pan's Garden' (248), by Harold Speed. I say 'faintest,' because in this beautiful picture the pipes were missing. 'Impromptu' (266), by Stefani M. Fisher, shows a performance on the 'yueh-ch'in,' or moon guitar, and recalls a similar subject by the same artist in the Academy of 1925. 'The King's Colour Passes: Scots Guards at St. James's Palace' (319), by Fred Roe, is mainly filled by the bagpipers, with their terrible instruments happily tucked under their arms. 'An Artist's Music Room' (369), by H. D. Richter, is full of sunlight and rich, warm colour; but had it been a musician's music-room, the handsome candelabrum, with its five candles of red wax, would not have been allowed to stand on the lid of the grand pianoforte. 'Concertina Players' (405), by Joan Manning-Sanders, a quintet which includes a tin whistle and some kind of mouth-organ, is a picture which fails to give me any pleasure; but as the composition of a girl of fifteen is certainly wonderful. 'Peasants of the Sabine Hills' (429), by Harry Morley, is a carefully painted and extremely interesting picture: a man is playing the zampogna, with its four pipes. Perhaps I ought not to mention 'The Drum' (433), by Maud Tindal Atkinson, for there is nothing musical about it beyond the title. It is most beautifully painted: in the foreground on the left a man and a girl stand in a close embrace; while far below in the distance troops are advancing along the road, headed by a drummer. 'Ave Maria' (434), by Mark Symons, an elaborate composition in the style of the 15th century, is perhaps not quite so successful as the artist's 'Lauda Sion' of last year: of the many child-like (or angelic) figures, two have long, golden trumpets, while a third plays on a drum of strange design. 'The Trumpeter' (538), by H. H. Brown, suffers from not being a full-length portrait; he is in the act of blowing his instrument; a group of the Yeomen of the Guard on the right, with a troop of the Royal Horse Guards in the background on the left. 'A joyous band of youths and maidens bounding hand in hand' (552), by Noel L. Nisbet, is a conventional subject of classic design, one of the figures bearing a flute. Among six hundred and nineteen oil paintings only eleven containing any suggestion of music!

The water-colours number two hundred and sixty-four, but I could discover only three in which there was the slightest reference to anything musical. 'Le Clocher de Sainte Catherine, Honfleur' (718), by William Cartledge, is by no means the least distinguished of the many exhibits dealing with architectural subjects. The 'Canterbury Pilgrims' (871), by Meredith W. Hawes, shows the musician with his bagpipe. And for those who prefer something more fashionable, there is 'At the Opera' (878), by E. J. Victor Pasmore.

Among the miniatures, amounting to ninety-nine, I was very pleased to find 'The late John Francis Barnett' (898), by Walter F. Cook.

The drawings, engravings, and etchings have this season been promoted to Gallery No. 6. Out of two hundred and fifteen exhibits, four deal more or less with matters musical. 'John, fifth Duke of Richmond, after Sanders' (985), is a very fine mezzotint by H. Macbeth-Raeburn. The Duke is holding a small hunting-horn in his hand. 'The Fiddler' (1052), etching by A. J. Heaney, reminded me of the old joke about Parliament Street—so named because the Houses of Parliament are in another thoroughfare. The etching depicts a number of people eagerly staring at something or somebody, but the fiddler is conspicuous by his absence. In 'Tarantella' (1100), dry point by Harry Morley, whose 'Peasants of the Sabine Hills' is mentioned above, the dancers are quite in the background: the principal figures are a man with a zampogna and a woman with a large tambourine. 'Wandering Musicians' (1163), a pen drawing by Marjorie R. McGill, is a group of three—a man playing a violin, with male and female vocalist.

In the Architectural Room, containing a hundred and ninety-seven designs, I was unable to discover the least trace of the existence of such a thing as music. There were several designs for stained glass—more than usual, I thought; and I did expect to meet with King David playing the harp. But no; he was not there.

The sculptors seem to have paid more attention this season to music of some sort. 'But all has passed, the tune has died away, the glamour gone' (1428), relief by Constance M. Pargeter, is arresting and striking, depicting a female figure with cymbals—scarcely enough sermon, perhaps, for the text—you can't get much tune out of a pair of cymbals. 'The Charm of Pan' (1431), statuette group in bronze by Donald Gilbert, is delightful: Pan, with a diaulos, is accompanied by a couple of goats. A bust, also in bronze, of 'W. T. Cockerill, Esq., Secretary of the Ancient Society of College Youths' (1421), by Muriel B. G. Hiley, is very fine. 'St. Cecilia' (1478), bronze statuette by Albert Toft, stands holding an open book with large oblong leaves, presumably a music book. A Case of Coins (1523), from the Royal Mint, includes a few designed by Percy Metcalfe for the Irish Free State, one of which is engraved with a harp. This instrument resembles that popularly known as the harp of Brian Boru, preserved in the Museum of Trinity College, Dublin—although Brian Boru had no more to do with it than has the present writer, and it is encircled by an inscription in a language which not one Irishman in a thousand can either read or speak. The most conspicuous object among the pieces of sculpture, and possibly the finest, is the magnificent 'Great Pan' (1557), by Gilbert Bayes, in his hands a syrinx with the usual number of pipes, namely, seven. 'A Young Faun' (1581), by Winnifred Turner, is a statuette of glazed earthenware, with the number of pipes reduced to six.

I left Burlington House with the impression that the bagpipe was the favourite musical instrument of this year's exhibition; and I could not help wondering if this idea fairly represented the musical outlook of the Royal Academy of Arts. I hope not.

PUPPETS IN OPERA

By Basil Maine

It is almost impossible to uproot certain habits of mind. So often the roots are the very fibres of our being; in these cases the habit may be excused on the ground that it is essential to the life. But there are other habits no less difficult to disentangle from everyday existence, which are false creations, excrescences. These are usually the complex result of individual heredity, environment, and temperamental bias. When such habits are transferred from the individual to the community, they become even more deeply rooted. So we find certain customs, traditions, and manners persisting changelessly through changing generations. On the face of it they are absurd, but they continue not in spite, but because, of their absurdity. Human nature is only too prone to endow the incongruous with some supposed quality of mystery and sacredness. An example of the obstinate survival of an absurd tradition is the kind of acting which we gladly suffer during an operatic production.

Acting in opera! The term is almost a contradiction in itself. We do not associate opera with acting, or rather we associate it with that grossly exaggerated form of gesture and expression, the skitting of which is the last resource of the music-hall comedian and the revue sketch. The stage conduct of an opera singer is not so much acting as 'finding something to do.' The trouble is that the average opera singer begins to busy himself about finding something to do just at the very moment when the composer is doing it for him, either in the orchestral score or in the direction of the vocal line. The sense of repose is the rarest of all the stage senses—and this is true not only of the opera house, but of the whole theatre. The amazing thing is that the person who would profit most by reposing, even for a few consecutive seconds, is the very one who insists upon introducing all kinds of extraneous irrelevant activity, thereby increasing a task already sufficiently difficult in itself. That this activity is extraneous and irrelevant can be shown by a simple test which is applicable to any operatic situation: let the singers repeat the scene without the music and let them speak their lines, using the same gestures and movements which they saw fit to use while singing!

MARIONETTES

How shall we change the bad tradition of operatic acting? To some it may seem far-fetched to suggest that the marionettes offer a solution. Not long ago I went to see a puppet performance of Massenet's 'Cinderella,' and my conviction was deepened that puppets are the only perfect actors. The reason is clear. They have no life outside the theatre. After they have made their quaint little bows to the audience they retire to their boxes at the back of the stage and sleep the sleep of the unworldly.

There are certain operas which are admirably suited to marionette technique. Donizetti's 'Elixir of Love' is a good example, and Massenet's 'Cinderella' is another. The scene in the third Act of the latter, in which Cinderella's father is sympathising with her in her unhappiness, is beautifully written, and as portrayed by the marionettes becomes a very moving episode. Throughout the performance I was reflecting that if only opera singers were content to learn from these children of the theatre, the absurdities of operatic convention would quickly disappear. The economy exercised over gesture by the characters in this little work, the significance of their repose, and the pointedness of their sudden activity were an example to all stage singers—not an example to be followed literally, but one containing a wealth of suggestion for those with eyes to see and imaginations to perceive. The movements of Prince Charming coincided with every stress and phrase-line of his vocal part. He was a stern rebuke to the semaphoring Tristans whom we still continue to tolerate. As for Cinderella, the grace and wistfulness of her bearing might serve as an example for many an assertive prima donna.

MASTER PETER'S PUPPET SHOW

Of course, some operas are more suited to marionette technique than others, but the memory of that scene I have quoted from 'Cinderella' assures me that puppet operas need not necessarily be comedies or burlesques. The delicate art of these little figures can sometimes produce a poignancy which eludes the ordinary flesh-and-blood actor, whatever transports his voice may suggest. One advantage that the puppet has over the living actor is that his facial expression is fixed. 'Surely this is not an advantage,' you will say. In a production of 'Othello,' or 'Hamlet,' no; but there are plays in which the fixed and wistful stare of the little figures is most appropriate. In such plays a mobile expression is a definite danger. At a performance of de Falla's 'Master Peter's Puppet Show' which I saw some time ago in the Marionetten-Theater at Zürich, I was impressed by the intensity of purpose which was revealed by each of the characters in the play, and afterwards I reflected that this, and the fact that each character was clearly defined, was due just as much to the expression of each puppet as to the elegance of the musical score; and this conviction was deepened by comparing this performance, in which the characters of Don Quixote, Sancho Panza, and Pedro were played by puppets, with others in which these characters were played by living actors. My reflection led me to a strong desire to see a production of 'Pélleas and Mélisande' with the characters conveyed by the spiritualising presence of the marionettes.

HANS PFITZNER

By Fritz Erckmann

Of two living German composers it may safely be predicted that the history of music will preserve their names for hundreds of years—Richard Strauss, the composer of 'Salome,' 'Rosenkavalier,' 'Frau ohne Schatten,' 'Ægyptische Helena,' and Hans Pfitzner, whose sixtieth birthday we celebrated a few days ago. Both have drunk at the same fountain, i.e., German Romanticism. The name and art of Richard Wagner was sacred to both.

But as the Southern aristocratic Strauss created early in life a personal, glittering style of composition, Pfitzner withdrew from the splendour of the day, retiring into the 'mondbeglänzte Zaubernacht' of Eichendorff, so beloved by Germans. It is easy and grateful to grow enthusiastic over Strauss, and to parade his compositions well-known and understood by all; but Hans Pfitzner, who also stands in the forefront of creative artists, lacks everything which goes to the making of a favourite of the public.

Pfitzner, originally a Wagnerian, found his way back to absolute music, creating a dramatic style entirely his own. He has written operas, orchestral works, chamber music, and songs, which, in spite of their diversity, are convincingly uniform; they are concessionless and ethical, and therefore not easily understood or accepted by the masses.

He is a solitary figure in the realm of music, the last rock against the flood of international musical production, joyous and fully cognisant of the position assigned to him by fate.

Hans Pfitzner was born on May 5, 1869, of German parents, at Moscow; the father was an able violinist, the mother a pianist, pupil of Villoing, the teacher of Rubinstein. In 1878 the family went to Frankfort-on-Maine, where the father accepted a post as musical director at the Stadt-Theater. Here the boy wrote his earliest compositions, which are said to be perfect in form and excellent in matter. Eight years later he attended the Hoch-Konservatorium, studied counterpoint and composition under Iwan Knorr, and pianoforte under Prof. Kwast, whose charming and clever daughter he married later.

During his student period he composed music to the 'Fest auf Solhaug,' the 'Cello Sonata Op. 1, songs, Opp. 2-6, 'Der Blumen Rache,' by Freiligratt, for alto, female choir, and orchestra, an orchestral Scherzo, and an excellent Pianoforte Trio. Upon leaving the Conservatoire, the Musikschule at Coblenz claimed his services as teacher. Here he composed his first opera, 'Der arme Heinrich,' and gave in 1893, at Berlin, his first important concert, consisting of orchestral pieces and songs. After a brief stay at Mainz as fourth Kapellmeister, during which time his opera enjoyed a series of performances at Mainz and Frankfort, he settled down at Berlin as teacher of composition at the Stern Conservatorium and conductor at the Oper des Westens. This was the time of his next stage work—'Rose vom Liebesgarten,' 'Columbus,' for eight-part mixed chorus, and, besides other compositions, the Christmas Märchen 'Das Christ-Elflein,' which went the round of all the chief German theatres.

In 1907 Pfitzner, being tired of Berlin, became, after a brief stay at München, the leading force at Strasburg, gathering honours of all kinds. His activities came to an end with the loss of Alsace, and he retired to his idyllic home on the shore of Lake Ammer.

What has been sketched in these bare words meant for Pfitzner the Calvary of Genius. It is impossible to depict in like laconic form the sufferings this sensitive artist had to undergo in the treadmill of theatre and public life. On one occasion he confessed that he would have written more important works if German criticism had from the beginning been more friendly towards him and his music.

Dr. Richard Specht began his lecture on Hans Pfitzner at Vienna with these words: 'The invisible crown of thorns which always tore the head of every German artist, has in our time hardly torn deeper wounds into any forehead than in that of the tone-poet with whom we are concerned to-night.'

On the other hand, Pfitzner cannot complain of lack of courtesy and acknowledgment of his genius from the best in the land. He was honoured by State and University, and the number of his admirers is large.

Pfitzner's list of works comprises six operas, eight songs with orchestra, about a hundred songs with pianoforte accompaniment, five large choral works (amongst them the well-known 'Kantate von Deutscher Seele,' 1921), eight instrumental compositions, and six arrangements of works of other composers.

That is not much, but it is the final crowning of romantic music. Pfitzner himself is of opinion that he has supplied the last stone to the building of romantic opera.

This refers especially to 'Palestrina' (1912-15), his most representative composition. It is rather a symphony than an opera—altogether an inspired work. Indeed, it is the proof that Pfitzner composes only in moments of inspiration, which accounts for the fewness of his compositions.

This inherent feeling comprises yearning (Sehnsucht) and suffering. It may be said of him what the scald in Ibsen's 'Kronprätendent' maintains: 'I received the gift of suffering, and thus I became a singer.'

'Palestrina' would never have been written by a man accustomed to the glitter and glory of the world. It is the mirror and emblem of its composer, who has to pay for the hours assigned to him by suffering and sorrow. He is fully conscious of the fact that no art form is more impossible at the present time than romantic opera—and yet he wrote his 'Palestrina,' the story of the great Church musician Palestrina (1525-94), who fights for the freedom of his conscience.

Palestrina bewails those who live and think in modern tones; perhaps, he ponders, they may be right. 'Who can tell, if the world at present does not go by unanticipated paths, and that which appeared to us eternal may be blasted by the wind! Indeed, it is sad and hardly conceivable!'

These words are the roots of Pfitzner's artistic personality. Sharing the philosophic views of Schopenhauer and having Eichendorff, the pious poet, as his predecessor, he fights bitterly and passionately against the 'Futuristengefahr' (1917) and against the 'new æsthetics of musical impotence' (1920).

Will the world listen to his message?

MR. G. D. CUNNINGHAM ON HIS AMERICAN TOUR

In our March issue we gave some particulars of the great success achieved by Mr. G. D. Cunningham during his recent recital tour in America. Happening to run against him since his return, we made a point of catechising him on the subject, for the benefit of Musical Times readers.

We began by asking Mr. Cunningham as to the extent of his tour.

'Well,' he replied, 'I may claim to have covered a good bit of the map. I began my travels at New York, went down to Philadelphia, then back to New York, from thence to Canada (Toronto, Ottawa, and Montreal), then by stages across to the Pacific, recitalling at Utica, Colorado Springs, Spokane, Seattle, Portland, San Francisco, Stanford University, and Los Angeles—altogether about eleven thousand miles of travelling.'

'What are your impressions of American organs?' we asked.

'The four principal builders whose instruments came my way,' he replied, 'were Skinner, Austin, Kimball, and (in Canada) Cassavant. Generally speaking, these instruments are a long way ahead of ours in regard to action. They are all electric, all pistons are instantly adjustable, and everything possible seems to have been done to help the player in the way of prompt and easy registration. In fact, this virtue is sometimes carried to excess. Some of the accessories are not likely to appeal to English organists, whether on the ground of effect or even of convenience. For example, I was sorry to find a growing tendency to enclose every manual. Some organs had as many as five or six Swell pedals! After my experience of these large enclosed organs I am still of opinion that the Great on every organ should be left unenclosed. After all, there is nothing in any other musical medium corresponding to the foundation tone of an unenclosed Great, and it seems to me that by putting the Great in a box and making it practically another Swell organ, the possibilities of variety in a large organ are reduced rather than increased. It was interesting, by the way, to note the popularity of the divided organ, with one section in the East end of the church and the other in the West, played from a movable console. In many cases the console was placed in the middle of the Chancel steps in full view of the audience.'

'English organists, accustomed to the seclusion of their organ lofts, and, on the whole, rather fond of it, would find this somewhat embarrassing,' we suggested.

'That is true,' he replied, 'but the arrangement has the great advantage of bringing the performer into more direct touch with his audience, and so undoubtedly stimulates public interest. If organ recitalists in England are less appreciated than other soloists (as they are, and most unjustly, I think), it is partly because they are heard but not seen.'

'English organs being behind those of America in regard to action, how do they compare in the more important matter of tone?' we asked.

'Here I think we can certainly hold up our head,' replied Mr. Cunningham. 'With two exceptions, I felt that the ensemble in American organs lacks brightness. It seemed to me that this is due to the thick, heavy voicing of the reeds, and the timid treatment of Mixtures and the upper work generally. Both in scaling and voicing these seemed to be too modest, so that the general tone is "doughy."'

We inquired concerning the two exceptions.

'One was the new organ at Princeton University, in the magnificent new chapel. This instrument was built last year, by Skinner. In blend, ensemble, and general effect it is thrilling, full of brilliance, and yet dignified. The solo stops also are beautiful, and this, combined with the perfect action and the fine environment, made it the most enjoyable recital of the tour. (The organist here, by the way, is Ralph Downes, a young Englishman who was organ scholar at Keble, and who came out to America last year.) The other organ that pleased me specially was also a Skinner, just finished, at a big church in Los Angeles, in California. I found in it the same characteristics that made the Princeton organ so enjoyable to play.'

We discussed the programmes played by Mr. Cunningham. They made the very minimum of concession to popularity. Bach was represented by the 'Wedge' Prelude and Fugue, the Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, and the Toccata and Fugue in D minor; Franck by the A minor Choral, the Final, and the Prelude, Fugue, and Variation. Among the bigger of the modern works were the Liszt Introduction and Fugue on 'Ad Nos,' Max Reger's tremendous Fantasia and Fugue on B A C H, the Reubke Sonata (complete), the opening movement of Widor's fifth Symphony, and the Finale of the seventh. The English school was represented by Wesley, Parry, Vaughan Williams, Wolstenholme, and Purcell. In the way of light relief there were Wolstenholme's Allegretto in E flat, a Haydn Air and Variations, and Gigout's Scherzo in E.

We asked Mr. Cunningham how these substantial programmes suited the taste of his audience.

'I can only say that I was delighted by their reception. It convinced me that there is a very large public for the finest things in organ music. It was interesting to note, in this connection, that the two items that seemed to arouse the most interest and enthusiasm were the Reubke Sonata and the Max Reger Fantasia and Fugue. The audiences were everywhere large. I should like to add that I shall never forget the kindness and hospitality I met with everywhere. On leaving each of my stopping-places I felt genuine regret. I seemed to be parting with real friends. I had been led to expect much in the way of hospitality, but my expectations fell far short of the reality. It was a really wonderful time, on which I shall always look back with pleasure and gratitude.'

master of his instrument,' and referred to the 'amazing feats of bravura . . . in the superlative rendition of Reubke's Sonata,' which was played with a 'fine dramatic power.' The Ottawa Journal described him as a 'concert organist of the very front rank. . . . Reger's transcendently difficult work was played with such verve, such assurance, such commanding authority, that technically, at any rate, it seemed unapproachable; to equal it would seem to be an improbability, to surpass it an impossibility. . . . A king on the King of Instruments.' The Citizen (Ottawa) said that 'for clean playing he has no superiors and few equals. His command over the pedal board was

MR. CUNNINGHAM AT THE ORGAN IN THE WANAMAKER AUDITORIUM

Concerning the principal cause of the success of the tour, Mr. Cunningham was necessarily silent. Let us supply the omission. We have collected a batch of press cuttings from American and Canadian papers, a few sentences from which we quote. The Diapason spoke of Mr. Cunningham's 'superb technique, remarkable memory, and fine musicianship,' and said that he was 'to be counted among the foremost organ virtuosos of the day.' (The reference to his memory reminds us to add that the whole of the programmes were played without copy.) The New York Evening World described him as 'a serious and imaginative ideal. A magnificent demonstration of organ virtuosity in its highest form.' The New York Sun referred to his 'musicianship and catholic taste' and 'his facility in achieving the most difficult of orchestral effects,' and (in a sense the best of all tributes) the San Francisco Examiner wrote of him that 'he is a brilliant technician, but he does not forget the musician in the virtuoso.'

These are only a few of the many glowing tributes to Mr. Cunningham's playing. As we said in a note in the March Musical Times, we hope that this tour of Mr. Cunningham's will lead to similar tours by other English players.

In fact, we should like to see developed a series of tours of a reciprocal nature. We believe it would benefit organists, organ music, and organ-builders on both sides of the Atlantic if a few of the best players from each country could exchange visits annually. In any case, now that our friends over the water have had, and enjoyed, a sample of English organ-playing at its best, we hope they will ask for more.

Music in the Foreign Press

ALBERT ROUSSEL

Albert Roussel's sixtieth birthday has been worthily celebrated in the French musical press. The Revue Musicale devoted the whole of its April number to him. This special number contains articles by eleven writers, among whom are Henri Prunières, P. O. Ferroud, H. Gil-Marchex, and Nadia Boulanger. A supplement contains music written in honour of Roussel by Conrad Beck, Maurice Delage, Arthur Honegger, Arthur Hoerée, Jacques Ibert, Darius Milhaud, Francis Poulenc, and Alexandre Tansman.

Arthur Hoerée, considering Roussel's technique, calls attention to his skilful use of modal scales :

> 'No other musician makes so great and so varied a use of them ; they have influenced his melodic style, modifying inflexions, determining new leading-notes and dominants. He resorts not only to Greek modes, but to altered scales, from which he derives new harmonic and modulatory principles. His melodies are broad, sustained, carried on without repetitions or redundance. His syntax and logic are entirely his own.'

The Courrier Musical (April 15) contains a biographical sketch by Hoerée, and an article on Roussel's dramatic works by Gustave Samazeuilh.

In the Ménestrel (April 19), Joseph Baruzi writes :

> 'Every work of Roussel's represents a fresh start, a discovery of new horizons ; it is a quest not so much of self-expression as of untried forces : some of these latent in him, and to be discovered by dint of arduous labour ; others to be sought far afield, by dint of long and subtly contrived approach. Hence the arresting significance of utterances such as, e.g., the first movement of his Symphony.'

RALPH VAUGHAN WILLIAMS

In the April Revista Musical Catalana, V. M. de Gibert devotes a thoughtful essay to Ralph Vaughan Williams, with special reference to 'The Shepherds of the Delectable Mountains,' 'Flos Campi,' and A. E. F. Dickinson's 'Introduction to the Music of R. Vaughan Williams.'

STRAVINSKY

The April Melos contains four articles on Stravinsky, by Heinrich Strobel, Ernest Schoen, Hans Curjel, and Willy Tappolet.

SCHÖNBERG'S 'SATIRES' (OP. 28) AND A NEW DEPARTURE IN CRITICISM

In the same issue, an article on Schönberg's 'Drei Satiren' (Op. 28) appears under the joint signatures of Hans Mersmann, Hans Schultze-Ritter, and Heinrich Strobel. A prefatory note explains that the object of this innovation is 'to do away with the contingencies and restrictions to which each individual is exposed.' The verdict is :

> 'Schönberg's "Satires," whether considered in themselves or from the point of view of evolution, are devoid of particular value. But they may be taken as constituting a symptom, as being an attempt by Schönberg to defend himself against an evolution that threatens to swamp him, although it was he who first pointed out its direction.'

THE VERDI CRAZE IN GERMANY

In the Monde Musical (March 31), Emile Haraszti writes :

> 'Verdi's music is in greater favour than Wagner's in Germany just now. It is to the weariness and mental depression of the Germans that this condition of things should be ascribed. Wagner no longer satisfies the requirements of German audiences nor of German singers—with whom bel canto is gaining ground every day. The public like Verdi for his lack of philosophical implications, for his vehemence and impassioned directness. But this is merely a temporary state of things, brought about by artificial post-war conditions. Moreover, the Verdi whom the German public enjoys is not the Italian Verdi, but a German Verdi in whose music the Italian slancio is replaced by coarse and vulgar brutality. The Germans are utterly incapable of seeing the fundamentally Italian genius of Verdi in its true light. Specialists and business men are eyeing the revival askance ; they realise that it is bound to be short-lived, that it is spoiling the public taste both for Wagner and for modern music such as Stravinsky's or Alban Berg's. What will they be able to resort to when the Verdi craze is ended ?'

THE POSSIBILITIES OF THE SAXOPHONE

These are considered by Viktor Ullmann in the March Auftakt. He thinks that the inclusion of a contrabass saxophone in the orchestra would prove most useful, and that if the various saxophones were included, many problems of orchestral setting would be solved, but many new ones would crop up. A septet of saxophones, extending from the sopranino to the contrabass, could replace all the wood-wind except, perhaps, the flute. Even then, however, the timbres of the oboe and clarinet would be missed. An incidental advantage of the saxophone is that players are not compelled to retain within their lungs a proportion of oxidised air, as happens to oboe and bassoon players, to the great detriment of their health.

CAMPRA'S RELIGIOUS MUSIC

In the March Tribune de St. Gervais, L. de la Laurencie calls attention to the religious music of Campra :

> 'The Motets are remarkable for their supple melody, for skilful uses of dissonance and modulation, and for striking instrumental effects. The two books of "Psaumes à Grand Chœur" teem with instances of fine choral and orchestral writing. A good deal of Campra's output remains unpublished to this day.'

AN UNKNOWN BERLIOZ CANTATA

The Monde Musical (March 31) announces the discovery of Berlioz's cantata 'La Mort d'Orphée' (1828), which Eugène Borrel describes as immature but characteristic. The work is shortly to be published.

ICELANDIC FOLK-SONGS

In the March Zeitschrift für Musikwissenschaft Jon Leifs writes on Icelandic native tunes. He lays stress on the variety of metres that characterises them. Further articles on this subject are promised.

VALVE versus SLIDE TROMBONES

In the Revue Musicale Belge (April 5), Paul Gilson expresses the opinion that the current prejudice in favour of slide-trombones is unfounded:

> 'Quality of tone depends upon the player's capacity; and I have never noticed that in well-constructed valve-trombones this quality is necessarily inferior. Three-valve trombones are not quite true to pitch, but six-valve trombones, as invented by Sax and adopted by Gevaert, at the Brussels Conservatoire, are unexceptionable.'

VERSATILITY

In the same issue is mentioned an advertisement in a Belgian newspaper, in which a restaurant proprietor asks for a violinist proficent in the art of opening oysters.

AN ESTHONIAN PERIODICAL

At Tartu (Esthonia) has appeared the first number of a musical monthly, Eesti Muuzika. It contains, among other useful materials, an essay on the evolution value of Esthonian folk-tunes, by Robert Lach, and one on the kannel, a native instrument now obsolete, by Elmar Arro.

M.-D. CALVOCORESSI.

Occasional Notes

The orchestral situation in London is gradually clearing up. At the time of writing it seems to be settled that, as a result of negotiations between the Gramophone Company, Mr. Lionel Powell, and the London Symphony Orchestra, that body of players will be placed on a permanent footing. The orchestra will number from seventy to a hundred players, and the deputy system will be abolished. There is a likelihood that tours will be arranged in the provinces, and probably on the Continent as well. Apparently there is to be no permanent conductor, the work being shared between prominent guests.

At first sight this development has all the appearance of a counter-attack on the B.B.C. National Orchestra scheme. Mr. Lionel Powell, however, says that this is not so. 'We have been trying to effect this agreement for years,' he says, 'and there is no question of trying to cut the ground from either the B.B.C. or its conductor, Sir Thomas Beecham.'

The only point in the arrangement so far made that seems to us to be questionable is the policy of guest-conductors. If, as is generally agreed, the high standard reached by the best American and Continental orchestras is largely due to the fact that the players are constantly rehearsing and performing under the same conductor, it seems a pity that a similar policy could not be pursued in the case of the London Symphony Orchestra. However, box-office considerations cannot be ignored, and so long as the foreign guest-conductor is a better draw than a mere Englishman, no matter how distinguished and accomplished the latter may be, the L.S.O. can hardly be blamed.

Meanwhile the B.B.C. is proceeding with the formation of the orchestra which Sir Thomas Beecham is to conduct. According to reports, this scheme will have the backing of the other great rival gramophone company, the Columbia. One thing is certain. As both these orchestras will be working on the no-deputy system, will have ample financial backing, and will be able to guarantee full-time work to the players, it is evident that Londoners may look forward to a future in which both quantity and quality in orchestral playing should reach a height unknown in the capital for many years. At all events, it will be no longer necessary to preface a discussion of London orchestral concerts by a series of 'ifs' and 'buts' and other apologetic noises.

It is good news that Sir Thomas Beecham's Opera League is well on the way to final success. This again should assure a good deal of constant work for singers and players. It will also place Opera on the right democratic basis. At present it falls between two stools, the de luxe of Covent Garden, in which (despite all that its champions say) wealth and fashion play too big a part, and activities wherein (good as are the results attained) one is but too conscious of limitations brought about by lack of money. Now that the Opera League has turned the corner and is making good progress in the last lap, readers who have not yet become members should join without delay.

Apropos of opera, it has been left for Mr. Ernest Newman to bring forward a new and curious argument as a proof of the vitality of the form:

> 'Show me another musical form that occupies to the same degree so many of the acutest minds of our time, and I will show you a form comparable to that of opera. But there is no such form. Good music will continue to be written in the other forms, but the purer a form is, the fewer elements it contains, and therefore the sooner are we likely to come to the end of the number of changes that can be rung upon them; whereas opera is not only the combination of many elements, but there is the endless principle of life in the endless readjustments of these elements to each other from generation to generation.'

Without unduly straining this argument, we think it shows that the sonata form was far more vital when Emmanuel Bach and Clementi were experimenting with it than when Beethoven wrote his Opp. 110-111; and that Bach gave the quietus to the fugue form, which was at its liveliest when handled by Buxtehude and the early Italian ricercare writers. Similarly, the string quartet ought by now to have been moribund for generations, and the symphony should have died with Beethoven. Instead of which——! The fact is, surely, that the term 'vital' applies to works rather than to forms. All the forms have had their obituaries written at different times—fugue, oratorio, ballad-opera, sonata, madrigal, suite: all have succumbed—and then composers have come along and have shown that the form hasn't died, for the good reason that it was never alive. Life and death belong to the content, not to the form.

However (to return to the opera), the vitality of an art form, like that of a tree, is shown by the quality and quantity of its fruit rather than by the necessity for constant experimental graftings, and still less by a standing disagreement as to the classification of the fruit. (For the purposes of our argument we are giving form a kind of life.) Opera is about the oldest of all the forms, and the fact of its problems being still unsolved and apparently unsolvable surely indicates impracticability rather than vitality. The really satisfactory musical form is one which arrives at maturity pretty quickly—knows its own mind, so to speak—and proceeds to show itself a fit medium for fine music during successive generations.

We are sorry, by the way, to see that Mr. Newman's attachment to the opera has affected his controversial methods. He describes as 'noodles' the very considerable number of musicians who say that 'when they want music they go to the concert-room, and when they want drama they go to the theatre.' We ourselves have long since arrived at that view, not solely because of our noodleism (which, after all, is a natural affliction deserving of sympathy rather than jeers), but because, being fond of both music and drama, we have found so few operas in which both these constituents make a good show. Instead of calling names, Mr. Newman should mention a few representative plays of any period or type that have not suffered in unity, pace, or dialogue, or all three, by being operatically treated. He might also consider the relative proportion of perfect operas compared with the perfect examples of symphony, sonata, chamber music, and other forms of mere 'pure' music. Undeterred by hard names, we shall continue to attend the very few operas that satisfy us on musical, dramatic, and literary grounds (such as 'Othello,' 'The Mastersingers,' 'Carmen,' &c.), and for the rest shall continue, noodlewise, to take our music and drama neat instead of mixed. We shall need a good deal more cogent argument than we have yet seen before we can be persuaded that by taking two of the chief forms of art, and combining them in such a way that both are almost invariably below their best, you produce a new, complex, and superior form of art. Actually, the result is a bastard kind of entertainment, frequently attractive, but almost always more or less lop-sided. For example, the dramas in Wagner's operas are so tedious and unconvincing that they would be intolerable if played apart from their music; and the music of many other operas is so poor that only the glamour of the stage production and the voices and personalities of a few fine singers can save it from utter contempt. So we see 'Norma' revived at Covent Garden. Why? Because it is a good opera? No; but as a medium for a prima donna's display! Whoever heard of a feeble symphony or concerto being taken down from the shelf because it contained a fine fat part for some instrumental soloist?

We know that Mr. Newman is not serious when he cites the League of Opera Derby Sweepstake as a further proof of opera's vitality. But we mention the point because it reminds us of the passage in Leacock's 'Arcadian Adventures of the Idle Rich':

> 'The Grand Opera had sung itself into a huge deficit and closed. There remained nothing of it except the efforts of a committee of ladies to raise enough money to enable Signor Puffi to leave town, and the generous attempt of another committee to gather funds in order to keep Signor Pasti in the city. Beyond this, opera was dead, though the fact that the deficit was nearly twice as large as it had been the year before showed that public interest in music was increasing.'

P.S.—As a proof of our enthusiasm for opera, we add that we belong to the Opera League.

Readers will remember that in 1924 there took place at Westminster Abbey a very remarkable Festival Service, in which the choir consisted of the singers from a great number of Cathedral and Collegiate churches within the radius of about a hundred miles of London. We are informed that, by permission of the Dean, a similar Festival will take place on July 8 at 6 p.m. The choirs that took part in the 1924 Festival have been invited, and acceptances have been received from the following: St. George's, Windsor; St. Paul's Cathedral; Chelmsford Cathedral; Chichester Cathedral; Eton College and Lower Chapel; Magdalen College, Oxford; New College, Oxford; Christ Church, Oxford; Peterborough Cathedral; Rochester Cathedral; St. Alban's Cathedral; Bristol Cathedral; Guildford Cathedral; Portsmouth Cathedral; and St. Nicolas College, Chislehurst. The music will include Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens' and the following anthems: 'O praise the Lord,' Byrd; 'Let Thy merciful ears,' Weelkes; 'O clap your hands,' Gibbons; 'O Lord, look down,' Battishill; 'Glorious and powerful God,' Stanford; and 'Lord, Thou hast been our Refuge,' Vaughan Williams.

The number of seats available for the public will necessarily be limited, and admission will be by ticket only. Applications for tickets should be made to the Secretary of the Festival Service, The Song School, The Cloisters, Westminster Abbey, S.W.1, enclosing a stamped addressed envelope. As the expenses will be very heavy, applicants for tickets are expected to send a subscription.

The collection, less expenses, will be given to the School of English Church Music.

Many of our readers will be glad to know that the very successful series of Summer Schools of Church Music, which had to be abandoned during the past few years (chiefly for want of accommodation) will be renewed this year. The School will be held at St. Nicolas College, Chislehurst, from August 12 to August 15. The boys of the College choir will be in attendance to help in the services and practices. The lecturers will include: Dr. H. P. Coleman, of Peterborough Cathedral; Dr. Sydney Nicholson; Mr. C. Hylton Stewart, Rochester Cathedral; Capt. Francis Burgess; Mr. Harvey Grace; the Rev. G. H. Salter; the Rev. A. S. Duncan-Jones; and the Rev. Stuart Morgan.

Accommodation for forty students can be provided, a limited number being housed in the College precincts, and the rest near by. All meals will be served in the College dining hall. There are vacancies for only a few more students, so early application is advisable. The secretary is Mr. Eric Hunt, Cranbourne, Bromley Grove, Shortlands, Kent.

The International Congress of Braille Musical Experts, held in Paris during the last month, arrived at a decision which is a compliment to this country. Hitherto Braille music notation has differed widely, and many of the symbols used in one country could not be understood in others. The main object of the Congress was to secure uniformity. It was decided that in future the notation will follow one universally accepted style, that adopted in 1922 in England, when the National Institute for the Blind published its text-book on the subject, after many years of expert study.

An influential appeal has been sent out on behalf of our contemporary, Music and Letters. The position is that unless a hundred new subscribers are enrolled before October, the journal must cease publication. Music and Letters is everywhere and rightly acclaimed as an organ of real distinction, and its demise would be a matter of deep regret. In the current number, the editor, Mr. Fox-Strangways, quite frankly takes readers into his confidence. He says that the available capital is now exhausted. Expenses have been cut down to the minimum—the cost of printing, payment of contributors, and a small office; the profits have been just what he expected, i.e., nil. 'There has been,' he says, 'more love than money in the business,' and he adds, 'If those who see the magazine in the club or in the library, or who borrow it of friends, would now take it in for themselves, and if those who like to see its buff cover on their table would inspire this liking in their friends, it should not be impossible to get this extra hundred subscribers; and if these came to stay, so would Music and Letters.' We hope that so many of our readers will answer the appeal that the extra hundred mark will be left far behind. This admirable quarterly—a credit to English literary and musical scholarship—will then pay as well as stay.

At Canterbury from August 19 to August 24 will be held a musical and dramatic Festival of an unusual character. The musical side will consist of orchestral and choral concerts, with serenades and chamber concerts at night, given in the nave of the Cathedral or in the Chapter House. The choirs will be recruited from Kentish centres, and the orchestra will be that of the B.B.C. Theconductor is Dr. Adrian Boult. Drama will be represented by two plays. 'Everyman' will be acted out of doors in front of the West or South-West door of the Cathedral, where there is space for a large audience. (If wet, the performance will be in the Chapter House.) Marlowe's 'Doctor Faustus' will be acted in the Chapter House. The actors will be the Norwich Players from the Maddermarket Theatre, Norwich, and the producer will be Nugent Monck. There will be three events each day, one play and two concerts. The Festival manager is Mr. H. G. Barker, Chapter House, Canterbury, to whom inquiries for further particulars should be addressed.

The League of Arts performances in Hyde Park have been widely appreciated, and readers will be glad to know that by permission of H.M. Office of Works the League will this year give another series on each Saturday in June, and on July 6 and 13. The performances will take place in the natural amphitheatre that lies north of the Serpentine. The programmes will be on the lines of those of former years—folk-dancing and singing, sea-songs and shanties, Martin Shaw's 'Brer Rabbit,' &c. As there is no charge for admission, members of the audience are asked to contribute towards the cost of production by purchasing programmes (2*s*.).

A visit to Yugo-Slavia by a party of English music-lovers is being arranged for the last two weeks in August. The Yugo-Slav musical societies in various cities will give informal concerts of their national music, and although the English visitors will not travel as an organized choir, it is hoped that they in turn will give representative programmes of English music. Special travel facilities will be arranged, and concessions have already been granted by the Government of Yugo-Slavia, so that a tour of sixteen days will cost only about £30. Mr. Arthur Fagge will join the party as conductor, and Mr. Frederick Woodhouse, who has an intimate knowledge of Yugo-Slavia, will also be a member. The arrangements are in the hands of the Yugo-Slavia Express Agency, Ltd., 25, Cockspur Street, S.W.1, who will gladly answer all inquiries.

The Council of the Manchester Royal College of Music has unanimously elected Mr. R. J. Forbes to be Principal of the College, in succession to the late Dr. Adolf Brodsky.

In Mr. Edwin Evans's report of the Geneva Festival, he referred to the Pro Arte Quartet. By a regrettable slip this title appeared as 'Prolute.'

The Musician's Bookshelf

'Musical Discourse.' By Richard Aldrich.
[Oxford University Press, 12*s*. 6*d*.]

This volume consists of sixteen essays, most of which appeared originally in the New York Times. Mr. Aldrich is common-sensible rather than brilliant, handling in a plain, practical way such subjects as programme music, folk-song in America, Shakespeare and music, the modernising of Bach, Berlioz, Jenny Lind and Barnum, &c. The essay on 'Shakespeare and Music' might well have been called 'Composers and Shakespeare,' seeing that the greater part of it is given up to an enumeration of the composers who have set his poems or plays to music. This chapter would have gained greatly in value had Mr. Aldrich discussed the far more important point of Shakespeare's use of music as a means of heightening dramatic situations or of evoking atmosphere. He makes a curious little slip at the start when, speaking of the musical culture in England in Shakespeare's day, he says, 'Every person claiming any title to education or social position was expected to do his share in extemporaneous part-singing.' Not extemporaneous, surely!

Berlioz comes in for hard words. An important part of this essay is the long list of performances of his works in New York from 1842 downwards. New York, in fact, seems to have been ahead of London in Berlioz propaganda. Clearly, if early recognition, well followed up, could make a composer popular, Berlioz ought to have a big following in America. Concerning 'The Damnation of Faust,' Mr. Aldrich says that 'its best numbers are among the productions of Berlioz in which the breath of life most inheres; much of it, however, is ready for burial.' This is exactly the view that at least one hearer took as a result of the recent performance at Queen's Hall.

Mr. Aldrich discusses the modernising of Bach at considerable length, taking as his text a criticism of Mr. Harold Samuel's Bach recitals in New York. Evidently some purists felt that, well as Mr. Samuel played, he was not giving his hearers the pure milk of the word because he was playing on a pianoforte instead of on a harpsichord or clavichord. This sets Mr. Aldrich discussing the impossibility of reproducing to-day either the Bach effects or the circumstances in which they were heard. But such considerations seem to be futile. As Mr. Aldrich says, 'it seems almost as if we must have either a Bach-less world or a compromise.' Exactly; and as there is no question as to our choice, no good purpose is served by lamenting the compromise. Still, this does not justify so complete a disregard of the original as is sometimes shown by eminent performers. There can be no doubt that a great deal of Bach transcribing has no justification whatever. For example, most of us will agree with Mr. Aldrich's denunciation of those who transcribe his organ pieces for the pianoforte, 'solely to make a holiday for those virtuosos who find his harpsichord works insufficient for the display of their strength and facility.' This evil is less rife to-day, when the Suites and the 'Forty-eight' are drawn on by most of our recitalists. At the same time, one may protest against the pianoforte versions of some chorale preludes that cannot be satisfactorily performed on any other instrument than the organ.

Mr. Aldrich raises the question of singers. He asks, 'Were there any in Bach's day who could sing his solo airs any better than the best singers to-day? Many of these airs seem to us quite unvocal, and can be sung only with great labour and frequent signs of distress.' This bogey of the unvocal nature of Bach's writing for the voice is well on the way to being laid. The difficulties are great, but many of them do not exist when the singer is also a first-rate musician, and most of the other demands are of the type that can be met by any singer who has had the old-fashioned thorough grounding. As to the singers of Bach's own time, it seems to be clear that his little force of musicians, though small in numbers, was extremely capable. Bach was above all a practical musician—perhaps the most practical of all the great composers. Most of his works were written for immediate performance. Would he have gone on, week in, week out, writing difficult cantata arias unless he was sure that they would be at least tolerably performed? Those were the days of highly-skilled specialists rather than of widespread musical culture, and there seems to be no reason to suppose that the difficulties of Bach's solos could not be met as readily as his exacting writings for every type of solo instrument.

Of all these essays of Mr. Aldrich's we like best his spirited and thoroughly justified protest against the ballet. He takes the line that it is sheer presumption on the part of dancers, whether they hail from Russia or anywhere else, to claim that they interpret or illumine or add to music any significance that was not already there. Usually, they merely distort or degrade. Mr. Aldrich gives examples, such as the 'Carnaval' of Schumann, Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Scheherazade,' and Debussy's ill-used 'Faun.' A vigorous onslaught ends thus:

> 'Admirable, graceful, agreeable, and thoroughly developed in muscle as these Russians and other dancers are, they are humble and not quite necessary appendages to the art of music, which is not beholden to them for any instruction, illumination, or liberation whatever.'

That is well said. The fact is, we shall soon have to start a Society for the Protection of Music from ballet dancers, restaurant and cinema bands—and even from some opera composers. Music has too long been regarded as the handmaid of this, that, and the other. It is time she were left alone, and treated in a manner fitting the Queen of Arts.

'The Listener's History of Music.' By Percy A. Scholes. Vols. 2 and 3.

[Oxford University Press, 6*s*. each.]

P. A. S. has 'done it again' with a couple of books so readable and friendly that a host of listeners—if they know what's what—will rise up and call him blessed. The 'jacket' of the History tells us that it is 'an attempt to "tidy up" the mind of the music-lover' by showing him the relationship between the various musical styles and periods, the influence of composers on one another, &c. Vol. 2 accordingly deals with the Romantic and Nationalist Schools of the 19th century, and Vol. 3 brings the tale down to to-day. Mr. Scholes casts his net wide. Like Wesley, he may say 'the world is my parish,' for his title-page says that the History is for 'any concert-goer, pianolist, or gramophonist,' and that it provides also 'a course of study for adult classes in the Appreciation of Music.' Only the handful of tone-deaf, therefore, need not apply.

The plan of the books is logical. Thus, Vol. 2 begins with seventy-seven pages in which romantic music is discussed under various heads—the romantic attitude, romance in music, the musician as literary man and painter (programme music), romantic song, opera down to and during the romantic period—and then proceeds from the general to the particular with critical biographies of twenty-five composers, from Weber to Sullivan (pp. 78-157). The tale then resumes with 'Romantics as Nationalists' (pp. 161-191), and is rounded off with seventeen biographies from Smetana to Stanford (pp. 191-214). A comprehensive bibliography and a further note on programme music ends the volume. Book 3 deals with the Impressionist school, the neo-Romantics, and the anti-Romantics, with a final chapter on 'Life and Art in the 20th century.' Brief biographies again abound, the subjects being largely living composers of all nationalities.

Music-type examples are plentiful, and frequently of considerable length. There are many portraits—minute, like the biographies, but (again like the biographies) remarkably clear. The illustrations include also reproductions of impressionist, expressionistic, and cubist paintings. There are even a couple of drawings (apparently from fashion plates) of women's dress in 1926 and 1905. The illustration is entitled 'Economy,' and in a footnote the author tells us that 'in the 1880's a silk dress used eighteen yards of material where, in the 1920's, it uses only $2\frac{7}{8}$ yards.' (How does P. A. S. find out such things?) He goes on to 'assume that the cost of such a dress has diminished in proportion'—wherein, I am credibly informed, he assumes too much. The reader who wonders what all this has to do with music will see when he comes to the chapter in which the reference occurs—that dealing with life and art in the 20th century. Mr. Scholes—rightly, no doubt—takes the view that music is always in a state of sensitive response to the influence of social life. (This, of course, applies more to-day than in the past, when the practice of the art was far more exclusive.) Even more directly is it affected by the other arts—a point that has been too little regarded by most writers on music. One of the best features in this History is the author's discussion of the relationship between music and certain schools of literature and painting.

The remark made above as to Mr. Scholes having cast his net wide has another application, for he has managed to rope in as co-authors a little group of fellow-critics—Sir Henry Hadow, Sir Richard Terry, Dr. Ernest Walker, Mr. Edwin Evans, and Mr. W. McNaught. These read the typescript, and added notes—generally disputatious. The interjections add greatly to the interest as well as to the value of the work. There is even 'a certain liveliness' at times, notably in some of the remarks of 'E. W.' For example, on p. 165 Mr. Scholes, discussing folk-song, says:

> 'Everything we have in literature or music comes originally from the folk, and it is good occasionally to go back to the folk and regain their simple directness and their local colourings.'

Whereupon E. W., not without asperity: 'If "folk" here means "peasantry," then I fear I don't agree.' To which P. A. S. rejoins: 'And the worst of it is, it does!'

But there is much in Dr. Walker's protest. What ground have we for supposing that 'everything in literature or music' comes from the peasantry? Were there no creative faculties in the country-town as well as in the country-side? Probably a good proportion of folk-tunes and rhymes, sung by men in corduroys and hobnails, were written by their neighbours in knee-breeches and pumps. Wholesale ascription to the 'folk' is no more reasonable than the present-day ridiculous appropriation of the term 'labour' by manual workers. The black-coated brigade has always done something besides pay most of the taxes, surely!

If space permitted (the due amount has already been exceeded) I should like to fall out with Mr. Scholes concerning a few points. (Every reader will, as is inevitable in the case of a book containing so much that is really fresh and vital.) For example, on p. 42 we are told that Elgar's 'Falstaff' is > '. . . a comparative failure so far as public appreciation goes, and necessarily so, since the events and passions represented succeed one another so rapidly that even the most conscientious listener, with his eyes on the programme book which details the happenings, must almost inevitably lose his way and find himself struggling,' &c.

And serve the 'most conscientious listener' jolly well right! Let him drop that programme book and listen in a more general way. I know other musicians besides myself who never really enjoyed and understood 'Falstaff' until they dropped the 'conscientious' detailed listening, and took in the work merely as a splendid piece of music, with the fat knight at the back of their mind. A point-to-point setting doesn't always call for a point-to-point hearing. 'Falstaff' is gorgeous in sum because of its extraordinary wealth of detail. Our concern is with the sum.

I think these intensely interesting and lively volumes mark the summit of Mr. Scholes's work on behalf of the listener. He is not likely to go one better; and he may easily fall short of it and still do well.

'Maurice Ravel et son œuvre dramatique.' By Roland Manuel.

[Paris: Librairie de France, 15 francs.]

Apart from 'La Valse, Poème Chorégraphique,' Ravel's output comprises but three works originally intended for the stage: 'L'Heure Espagnole,' 'Daphnis et Chloé,' and 'L'Enfant et les Sortilèges.' But he himself turned into ballets two works which he had composed without ulterior motive: 'Ma Mère L'Oye,' and the 'Valses Nobles et Sentimentales.' 'Le Tombeau de Couperin'—also written at first for pianoforte solo, and orchestrated two years later—was used as dance-music by the Swedish Ballets. Therefore the range covered by this attractive booklet is greater than might be supposed. M. Roland Manuel studies these various works with sympathy and insight. He is a great admirer of Ravel, but does not admire him uncritically. He is far more successful in defining Ravel's outlook and idiosyncrasies than any other writer has been.

Ravel, he says, seems to enjoy tackling the impossible. He is as clever at heaping obstacles across his own path as most composers are at brushing them aside. He seeks stimuli in directions where no other composer would find any. In the matter of dramatic music, he eschews pathos, and invariably selects his subject-matter either from comedy or from Fairyland. The result is either a parody or a sublimation, but it always betokens a deep sensitiveness despite the apparent detachment.

In 'L'Heure Espagnole' he is 'a casuist and surgeon, who coldly regulates the accommodating, or salacious, attitude of his characters, giving to each of them a cylinder instead of a heart; but the hearts of which he deprives them are transferred to the clocks and puppets, in which they gently throb, lending to every little steel body the illusion of a soul and the tender warmth of life.' In 'Daphnis et Chloé' there is no deliberate archaism : ' Ravel himself is ready to confess that his conception of old Greece owes more to the French painters of the Revolution period than to Mycenæ, Ægina, or Byzantium.' In ' L'Enfant et les Sortilèges ' we realise how great a contrast there is between Madame Colette, the author of the libretto, who ' is all genuineness, all abandon,' and Ravel, ' in whom all is artifice and imposture.' M. Roland Manuel's conclusion is :

> ' Ravel finds discipline in his obstinate adhesion to narrow rules, whose arbitrariness never inconveniences him. He knows himself well ; he has spanned his boundaries—not in order to extend them, but ever to restrict them. Therein lies the secret of his power, with the touch of dryness which characterises it.'

The first chapter is biographical ; it gives the names of the seven judges whose verdict, in 1905, scandalously excluded Ravel from the Prix de Rome competition : Théodore Dubois, Massenet, Paladilhe, Reyer, Xavier Leroux, Hillemacher, and Roujon. It contains a couple of wrong dates, one of which, I understand, is the result of an error of memory on Ravel's part. The first season of the Russian Ballets took place at Paris, not in 1906, but in 1909 ; and it is during the summer of 1909 that the idea of ' Daphnis et Chloé ' cropped up for the first time. The same mistake occurred in M. Roland Manuel's previous book on Ravel (1913), and thence found its way into various English writings. The other mistake has to do with Schönberg's ' Pierrot Lunaire.' In 1913 it was not published, and had not been performed in France, so that Ravel had no opportunity to study it before he wrote the ' Poèmes de Mallarmé.' What he actually studied was Schönberg's ' Kammer Symphonie.'

' Viaggio Musicale in Europa.' By A. Lualdi.

[Edizioni ' Alpes,' Milano.]

A well-known Italian composer, Signor Adriano Lualdi, has recorded in a short volume his impressions of a tour embracing most of the great European music centres. He is a shrewd observer, and his writing being both lucid and fluent, it follows that the volume provides excellent reading. He makes no pretence of going to the root of present-day problems as they affect different countries, but it is evident that if his stay in certain lands was not long enough for thoroughness, Lualdi has made the most of his opportunities.

Of course, the English reader will be most interested in the chapters dealing with English music and musicians. The Italian writer has very definite views on both. He mentions Elgar as the most illustrious of our composers, but he has a warm feeling for Vaughan Williams, whose work he first heard at Venice in 1925, and whose ' Flos Campi ' pleased him when he came to know it in a London performance. He has also praise of the Quintet of Arthur Bliss, the first movement of which he describes as full of life and energy at times acrobatic, but not devoid of interest ; the second movement is harmonically uneasy, but not devoid of genuine emotion, and the Finale, ' a cascade of triplets,' suggests to him a nigger's tarantella.

It is characteristic of our present conditions that Lualdi heard two of the most distinguished English players not in England but in Germany. He found Léon Goossens equal to his fame. His tone reminds him more of the viola and the clarinet than of the typical, pastoral timbre of the oboe. In unison with the strings, says the author, the intonation and the vibrations are so disciplined that it becomes difficult to distinguish the tone of the wood from that of the stringed instruments.

Lionel Tertis also impressed him very favourably, and he gives high praise to the player's technique, intonation, and robust tone. But the expression he thought not as ' intense ' as one would expect from so admirable an artist. Incidentally, Lualdi mentions with praise the work of Sir Henry Wood —the ' excellent conductor ' responsible for the reading of Vaughan Williams's ' Flos Campi.'

In his review of other countries Lualdi says much that is illuminating and pertinent in criticism. It would take long to summarise his opinions, but perhaps I cannot conclude this brief notice with an item of greater interest than the statistics given by Lualdi of the amount contributed either by the State or the municipalities for upkeep of musical institutions in Germany. Here it is :

' The Story of Indian Music and Its Instruments.' By Ethel Rosenthal.

[William Reeves, 7*s.* 6*d.*]

This book professes to give an account of Indian music, but except in purely descriptive passages, such as the account of the vina, which will be of more interest to the artist than to the musician, and of Tyăgarāja, whom it blandly calls ' the Beethoven ' of Indian music—meaning merely the most famous musician, as opposed to others who are the ' Margaret Coopers of the East '—it perpetually shies off the point. No doubt Miss Rosenthal was pleasurably affected by what she heard, as everyone must be who listens attentively, but what she has written is merely a globe-trotter's book, skimming the surface and penetrating nothing.

The latter half of the book is taken up with reprints of things that are long out of date and never had any great value, and with accounts of present things that do not particularly matter. The bibliography prints sixpenny trash as if it were of the same value as Day's book, or Mudaliar's ; and Pingle, and Grosset in Lavignac's ' Encyclopédie,' are not even mentioned.

The ' All-India Conferences,' which up till now have achieved little positive result, are taken seriously, whereas the not unimportant subjects of time and tune are accorded about ten pages. But in the most unabashed scissors-and-paste there are sure to be some cuttings that the reader has not seen, and such value as the book has lies there.

'A History of Arabian Music to the 13th Century.' By H. G. Farmer.

[Luzac, 15*s.*]

This is a history of Arabia, with incidental mention of music and musicians. It appears, to one who is completely ignorant of that history and not very good at names and dates, to be carefully done and to be written by a scholar, and the transliteration is on a consistent plan.

There are seven chapters, each in three sections, of which the second professes to deal with music and the third with musicians; but we get very little idea of either theory or practice out of them, which is all that the readers of this paper want. Perhaps it is wrapped up in an excellently reproduced page of musical notation—for those who can read Arabic; or perhaps we shall find it in a promised 'companion volume' which is to 'deal with the theory and science in detail, from an historical point of view.' Project Lessons in Orchestration.' By Arthur E. Heacox.

[Oliver Ditson, Hawkes & Son, 6*s.* 6*d.*]

Here is a thoroughly practical instruction book. It consists of thirty-nine lessons, each being concerned with the orchestration of a given passage or movement. The lessons are well graded, and the student is thoroughly informed concerning all the instruments of the orchestra en route. Music-type is copiously used. The arrangement of the matter, both textual and musical, is such as to facilitate the reading and working. The lessons are planned to take about two hours each in preparation. The word 'project' in the title indicates the orchestration of a piece for which the student is prepared in a lesson leading up to it. The 'projects' may require a good deal more than two hours. As the author says, 'it is in the working of the "projects" that the student shows his ability and his grasp of the preceding lesson.' Examination candidates, and all who are likely to be called on to score (including those who are in charge of school orchestras) will find this an uncommonly useful little volume.

'First Lessons in Counterpoint.' By Thomas Keighley.

[Bayley & Ferguson, 3*s.*]

This little work deals with simple counterpoint and combined counterpoint up to the standard required by the A.R.C.O. and kindred examinations. The author is commendably clear and concise, and the book should prove a helpful and safe guide for beginners. A chapter on Applied Counterpoint quotes, with comments, the opening bars from a number of Bach's works, and numerous exercises on this subject are provided. In a prefatory note reference is made to five graded books of exercises published in conjunction with 'First Lessons in Counterpoint.' These—which, so far, are not to hand—are presumably similar in scope to the author's graded Harmony Questions and Exercises, issued with his treatise on Harmony. G. G.

'Vocal Tutor.' By Ralph Dunstan.

[Reid Bros.: Four books, 2*s.* 6*d.* each.]

This tutor is issued in four books: (1.) Soprano and Mezzo-Soprano; (2.) Contralto; (3.) Tenor; (4.) Baritone and Bass. The first of these, which has been sent for notice, provides a handy little collection of exercises for various purposes (attack, flexibility, portamento, &c.), vocalises by Concone, Panseron, and others, and extracts of a florid nature from the works of standard composers (Handel, Purcell, Haydn, &c.). 'Moussorgsky's "Boris Godounov" and its New Version.' By Victor Belaiev. Translated from the Russian by S. W. Pring.

[Oxford University Press, 4*s.*]

Thanks to Mr. Calvocoressi, readers of the Musical Times have had such ample opportunities of being well-informed concerning 'Boris Godounov' that a reviewer need do no more than draw their attention to this little book. In it is contained an authoritative statement of everything that need be known concerning the original and the various versions of Moussorgsky's opera.

SONGS

D. M. Stewart's songs are always neatly written, and sometimes achieve considerable atmosphere. These abilities make it more regrettable when the composer allows himself too easy a use of the commonplace. The beginning of 'After Lunch' is a case in point: a trite harmonic progression put into a position so important as this spoils the whole thing. 'Plucking the Rushes' is much better; it is sensitive and well thought-out; it suits the words. Somehow the songs are not quite what they might be; the feeling behind them is very musical, yet the writer seems content with the most obvious methods. Perhaps, however, if they were more carefully considered they would lose spontaneity, and thereby lessen or restrict their appeal. The songs are published by Augener, who also send a vivid and straightforward setting by Frederic Austin of W. H. Davies's poem, 'The Sleepers.' Hypercritical again, I suppose, but is a molto espressivo finish implied in the poem? Surely not; the mood is one of rather grim humour, and this concession weakens it. This is perhaps not a vital point, however, and the song has undoubted power. From the same house is Helen Fothergill's 'Storm Clouds.'

Louis Drakeford's settings of Browning's 'Cavalier' songs are published by Winthrop Rogers. There is plenty of conventional 'vim' here; expected rhythms give a certain blustering semblance of vitality, but there is no distinction of melody, and no vividness of outlook to raise the songs above the level of the very ordinary. Hawkes send the same composer's 'The Lifeboatman,' published under the auspices of the R.N.L.I. On the cover is a stirring picture of the lifeboat dashing to a wreck; the ensemble of the oars is worthy of a swell Cambridge crew.

C. Whitaker-Wilson's arrangement as a song of Schubert's A flat Pianoforte Impromptu has already been mentioned in the correspondence section of this paper. Here is the work, published by William Reeves, sung by Miss Dorothy Whybrow, and called, 'The Fisherman's Night Song.' It is extremely doubtful whether the words of the song and the general 'interpretation' of the Impromptu are sufficiently good to justify an experiment that is always risky.

A very useful reprint is that, by Novello, of Parry's 'My heart is like a singing bird.' This is one of Parry's most popular songs, and a very good one, and it is a convenience to have it published singly. Joseph Williams sends Chaminade's 'Villanelle' in the Dawson Freer edition, and also six songs by Dr. Arne, edited by Vittorio Ricci. Some of these are extremely attractive, as, for example, the songs called 'Nature beyond Art' and 'Colin's Invitation.' But one would like to know more about the songs. Where do they come from? Were they written to these present words? The works are sure of a welcome if they become known; a little more information about the editor's part in the publication would have improved their chances.

Ten songs by Frederick Boothroyd are published by the Coolidge Publishing Co., of Lander, Wyoming. The composer is at his best in the lighter and least pretentious songs, such as 'Sweethearts' and 'A Message.' His melodies here, if conventional, are graceful, and the harmonies natural; the effect as a whole is neat and pretty. When he attempts bigger things, as in 'Powder River' or 'The Destruction of Sennacherib,' he is apt to become melodramatic and banal. In justice it must be said that the words of the first of those songs (by Porter B. Coolidge) are enough to knock any composer off his length.

PIANOFORTE

The Organ Chorale Prelude on 'Wir glauben all' in einem Gott, Vater' (five-part double-pedal version in D minor) has been well arranged by Dr. Whittaker, and is issued by the Oxford University Press. It is perfect in workmanship, and, as Dr. Whittaker says, 'is one of the loveliest of all Bach's organ works based on chorales'; it certainly deserves to be better known than organists can make it. I wonder whether those who have long known and played it in its original form will recognise it when some of our pet pianists get to work on it. Misuse of the swell pedal is checked by a double-pedal part; for the pianist there is no such restraint, and one can see a good deal of rubato appassionato and shoulder-work going into it.

There is not much else for pianoforte this month. Two light pieces, published by Augener, are the only other arrivals. One is Eric Mareo's 'Court Dance,' the other Roman Statkowski's 'Krakowiak.'

VIOLIN

The second of Bach's six Violin Sonatas has been published in the Berners Edition (Joseph Williams), the editor being Mr. H. Wessely. As could be expected from so experienced a teacher, his revision of bowing and expression marks is all that one could wish. Here and there a trifle may indicate individual bias, and, for instance, the harmonic in the third bar of the Allemanda would seem to rob the phrase of some of its force. But these are trifles which do not in the least detract from the high merit of the work. It is probable that the other four Sonatas (No. 1 has already been published) will follow in due course.

Would it be possible, one wonders, to publish side by side with the edited, the original version? Such a publication would have exceptional importance in view of the very considerable changes made by less responsible editors than Mr. Wessely which are now frequently accepted as Bach's.

A charming little 'Dance of the Princess' of Hans Newsidler (found in a 16th-century lute book) has been arranged for violin and pianoforte by Harold Craxton (Oxford University Press). Old music has no more serious or devoted student than the editor of this dance. He probably keeps to the letter of the original—he certainly keeps to the spirit. There are then no interpolations to please a virtuoso or embellishments to please an uncritical audience in this piece; indeed, an occasional hint as to the fingering of the violin part would not have been amiss. But the graciousness and easy lilt of the original is unimpaired.

F. B.

CHAMBER MUSIC

A Quartet in one movement by James Lyon (Augener) deserves praise in that the writing is clear, devoid of oddities, yet interesting, and exploits well the genius of each instrument. The ideas discussed are attractive, and the discourse is never carried to excessive length—rather the opposite. The concluding Allegretto Scherzando, for instance, could be amplified with advantage to the whole. This, at least, is the impression derived from a reading. The actual performance might tell a different story.

Cedric Sharpe has arranged for string quartet, or string orchestra, a Tambourin by Gossec and the Gavotte from Thomas's opera 'Mignon' (Chester). As these pieces are not printed in score form, we must be content to take something for granted. Mr. Sharpe's skill being well known, there is no reason to suppose anything but absolute fidelity. But surely it must be the printer who gobbled up all the expression marks in the Gavotte. Apart from an mf at the beginning there is not a single indication of colour or fingering in the first violin part. In the 'cello part even the mf is omitted. This is carrying reticence a little too far.

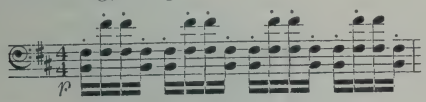
F. B.

'CELLO

Tennyson Werze's 'Souvenir d'autrefois' (Joseph Williams) almost reconciles the reader to the faults of the present. Whatever other sins modern composers may be guilty of, they are at least free from the excessive sweetness and the commonplaces the composer of 'Souvenir' accepts without demur.

Alfred Moffat has arranged for 'cello and pianoforte Couperin's Sarabande 'L'Unique' and Schumann's 'Lotusblume' (Augener). The arrangement is good, and the music no longer requires definition or description. But one expects, perhaps unreasonably, some sort of connection between two pieces published in the same volume. I confess that I have not found it. If of the two pieces one were in a slow and the other in a quick measure the customary contrasts of recitals would explain the combination. But this is far from being the case.

N. Karjinsky's 'Esquisse' and 'Prelude' (Chester) belong to that class of music which succeeds in arousing interest, but having aroused it, fails to hold it. The somewhat rhapsodic character of these compositions is in their favour, but by the time one reaches the last bar one has the impression that there is 'something too much of this.' Perhaps an inspired interpreter might lead us to a different conclusion. The music is certainly well written, apart from the passage in 'Esquisse' beginning:



I have never heard this kind of design sound quite satisfactory on the 'cello. The nature of the instrument is too heavy for this light staccato to sound effective.

UNISON

It is pleasant to find some new names on copies of school songs. There is now a very large number of teachers who know just what children like and need, and amongst these there must be perhaps a dozen or a score who could, with practice, write acceptable songs. The old hands well maintain the standard, and will be welcome as long as they keep fresh, but we want new writers too. Some of the names on Arnold's songs are new to me. Una Gwynne writes words and music of a whimsical miniature, 'The Mouse,' a sharp-set, brisk song with skipping intervals. T. F. Dunhill boldly sets 'Where the bee sucks,' competing quite winsomely with the old setting. Those who like a change should try this dainty piece. Its accompaniment, always a notable point with Dunhill, is very happily designed. May Sarson is poet and composer of 'The Silver Ball,' a wishing-song that girls in particular will enjoy. It is graceful, light, and jolly, showing the touch of imagination and the good workmanship that we want. Harold Sykes takes the old ballad of 'King Arthur' and his three thieving sons, and sets it in a mixture of 3-2 and 2-2 time, so that it runs along in pleasantly inconsequential style. It keeps to rather a small compass, the highest note being D, and it has not much variety of tune. The folk-song style carries it off, however, sufficiently well. Gladys Reeve is another poet-composer. Her 'England, awake!' is a call to make the country famous in art as it has been in deeds of honour. The verse is not very good, but will pass for its good intentions. The music should have long phrasing. It is quite well written, swinging freely and being as fresh as one can expect in this kind. George Dyson has two songs, 'Song of the Cyclops' (Dekker) and 'The Country Lad' (Breton). The former has a powerful rhythmic drive, and a fine braggadocio about it. Lusty lads can both let off steam in it and learn how to control their tone and delivery. A capital song to work at and master. 'The Country Lad' is also lively, but in rather more easy-going fashion. It is one of the best songs of the batch, exhilarating and resourceful, without being noisy or twisty. Norman Demuth's 'The Month of May' is a setting of the old 'Now is the month of Maying' that Morley beautified. Its rapid 'tra la la' work, staccato, and breezy delicacy are interesting qualities that will commend it widely (Arnold).

Martin Shaw has a new song for massed singing, 'Break forth into thanksgiving' (words from Wordsworth's 'Power of Sound'), which has also S.A.T.B. parts for alternative use. It is a little too complex, probably, for most audiences to learn well. The energy and élan please me. It could be used in church or Sunday School as well as on secular occasions. There, a choir of children, well coached, could sustain the main tune, the church choir carrying on the alternative part (Novello).

Several of the songs in Miss Greville's new collection, 'An English Posy' (reviewed last month), are issued separately. These are: 'Defiled is my name,' the song of a wronged one; 'The Actions of the Just,' a broadly-moving setting of words from Shirley's 'The Glories of our Blood and State'; 'My Sweet Little Darling,' a pretty lullaby; 'The Young Ploughman,' in folk-song style, brightly stepping out; 'Over the water to Charlie,' with its effective accompaniment suggesting the rolling sea; and 'If all the world were paper,' a swinging song in not quite satisfactory tonality. There are also two traditional airs arranged by Maurice Jacobson (issued separately): 'The Laird o' Cockpen' and 'Robin Redbreast's Testament.' The former ambles admirably, thanks to its well-devised accompaniment, and the latter is a quieter song, thoughtfully treated. Both are commendable. 'The Railway Porter' is an action-song with words and music by Paul Edmonds. The period is a rush hour, obviously, for the song is to be sung 'with a very gradual accelerando and crescendo.' Most of the words 'should be more spoken than sung,' it is directed. The actions are not suggested, but are left to the teacher's or (better) the children's devising. This song is full music size (Curwen, 2*s*.).

PART-SONGS FOR CHILDREN'S AND FEMALE VOICES

In the Winthrop Rogers edition, edited by Julius Harrison, there are several new numbers. The editor treats Blake's 'I love the jocund dance,' for S.S.A., with sprightly daintiness, setting some agreeable tasks in the way of intonation and rhythmic impulse, without overloading either the singers or the music. A choir with fairly well-tried technique will delight in this. His other song is also for S.S.A., 'A Sunny Shaft' (S. T. Coleridge). This also is moderately advanced work, with sensitive changes of time and colour, and a pianist with a neat finger (not necessarily great speed) is wanted. Both these songs should be tried, as should Dr. Bairstow's 'On a poet's lips I slept' (S.S.A.), a setting subtly reflecting the mood and shape of the poem. This is a little gem. Wagner's 'Song of Venus,' from 'Tannhäuser,' has been arranged by Mr. Harrison for S.S.A.A. This is a new translation, 'freely adapted for choral use,' and the song will be snapped up by all competent ladies' choirs. The only lack is, of course, the orchestration. The pianist should have a good sense of colour. I shall look forward to hearing this piece at some competition festival before long. Ivor Davies's 'The Warm Rain' (S.S.A.) goes allegro vivo, leggiero, the accompaniment (not too easy) keeping up a quaver movement nearly all the time. Care will be needed to avoid too many even stresses in the voice parts. The song can be worked up effectively (Hawkes).

Part-songs for two trebles in Arnold's list are H. L. Read's 'The Fairy Queene' (anonymous 16th-century words lightly and quite simply set, with pleasant impulse); 'The Lily-Pool,' a canon by Dorothy Howell, gracefully swaying, with some skips; Dr. Dyson's 'To the Thames' (poem by Denham, 17th century)—a splendid piece, to be sung in 'very broad and sonorous' style, and needing some experience to do well; and Harry Farjeon's 'The swallows are homing,' to a charming poem by Eleanor Farjeon. This has much delicacy, and needs also a capacity for free tonal expansion (Arnold).

George Rathbone's two-part canon 'Springtime' is an attractively flowing 9-8 piece, with a good, easy movement through a fairly large compass (top note—upper part only—G) (Novello).

Dr. Naylor has edited as a duet (from his 'Shakespeare Music') the old tune to 'It was a lover'; this is always welcome. The two voice parts can be used without the accompaniment; and the second voice can be omitted, and the music used as a song. W. T. Deane's 'Night sinks on the wave' (Mrs. Hemans), for S.A., is rather conventional, but would please not very sophisticated singers and hearers. It is suitable for church or Sunday School use, since it is a prayer. A. J. Silver takes Edward Lear's nonsense tale of 'The Owl and the Pussy-Cat' and sets it to appropriately chatty, bright music. Care is needed to keep the rhythmic impulse free and flexible. Two songs by Boughton appear, both for two equal voices—'The Green Tent' and 'Clouds.' These are settings of poems by W. H. Davies. The first is a summer song, gaily windy, except for the moral at the end. 'Clouds' has a squarish, folk-songish cast, but the direction allegro leggiero will prevent its being stiff. Both songs need a pianist of fair ability. They are quite easy to sing, and worth trying. An action song for boys, 'We Cobblers,' by Felix White, is placed here because it consists of a solo part and a chorus part (in unison mostly, though with a few two-part chords in it). There is also a dance. The actions need not be many or elaborate, of course. A straightforward, likeable song (Curwen).

W. R. A.

MALE-VOICE

Dr. Bairstow's setting of 'Music, when soft voices die,' for T.T.B.B., touches the heart of the words, and does the greatest service of all—lets us remember the poem as the more fragrant because of the music, not as a lovely thing overlaid. Everyone who has tried to set this poem (and I suppose that means more than half the students of composition) knows the dangers in it. It is worth any choir's or quartet's while to get this piece (Hawkes).

Easthope Martin was a clever composer whose best work is too little known. Things like 'Langley Fair' are just ballads, but his bigger things went deeper, and proved him a real artist. This song of the fair has been edited by R. D. Metcalfe, and is for T.T.B.B. It is of the familiar brand, that many choirs like well (Enoch).

Boughton's 'The Gentle Heart' has words by the 13th-century Italian, Guinicelli, translated by D. G. Rossetti. It is for T.T.BAR.B., and covers fourteen pages. Its ideas are clear, its exposition sound, and its emotion well controlled. It offers good scope to a choir able to build up its impressions into a convincing whole (J. Williams).

MIXED-VOICE

'Day of Days' is an anniversary hymn for scholars and choir, competently written in an old-fashioned style, reminding one of much music of thirty years ago. Words and music are by Basil Sellars (Curwen).

Peter Warlock has transcribed and edited all Ravenscroft's collected rounds and catches, under the title of 'Pammelia.' Well I remember days spent in the British Museum, delving amongst these and other early writings, and in some of them having to use discretion as to reproducing the words, which were not always suitable for refined company. Those here included are quite safe. There is a great gap between 'Sumer is icumen in' (early 13th century) and these rounds, though some of them belong to the 15th century, at least. Canons are excellent material for studying the bases of good part-singing, as has often been pointed out here, and such graceful devices as the 'Round of Three Country Dances in One' (Cantus, Medius, and Tenor, with a 'Basse or Ground') should be widely sung, for their interest and charm alone. This round reminds us of the method of 'Sumer,' for the three upper voices carry on the separate tunes, whilst the bass sings his ground repeatedly. The school edition of 'Pammelia' costs 2*s*. (Oxford University Press).

Two additional numbers in the happy 'Rhythmic Band' series are to hand—Ernest Read's arrangements of the Beethoven Minuet in G, that Kreisler and other fiddlers are so fond of playing, and of a Mozart Minuet in F. The score is for castanets, triangles, cymbals, tambourines, drums, and pianoforte. There is a child-conductor's score (6*d*.), and all the parts of each piece complete cost 1*s*. 6*d*. (Williams).

Gramophone Notes

BY 'DISCUS'

H.M.V.

Beethoven's 'Leonora' No. 3 is given a fine performance by the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Schalk. Here we have the size and scope of the work, and all I feel lacking is something in the way of colour, and a little more drama in the trumpet call, which doesn't seem to come quite near enough with each repetition (D1614-15).

A record in which the performers are Cortot, Thibaud, and Casals leaves the critic with little to say. They play Beethoven's Trio in B flat, the 'Archduke,' and the result is about as near perfection in the recording of chamber music as we shall probably ever get. Only one detail needs improvement to make it perfect, and that is the tone of Cortot. In ensemble passages it is all that can be desired, but in the solo bits he lapses occasionally into the thin quality which frequently takes the gilt off his performances on the platform. Even so, the blemish is too small to interfere with one's enjoyment of a great work worthily recorded. But the reader who is already reaching for his cheque-book should be warned that the records are priced at—hold your breath!—8*s.* 6*d.* each. As there are five records (DB1223-27) this tots up to a tidy sum that may well give some of us pause.

The 'Dance of the Seven Veils,' from Strauss's 'Salome,' is finely interpreted by the Berlin State Opera Orchestra, conducted by Otto Klemperer. But the music itself, I feel, wears badly. It is the kind of thing that has ceased to give us thrills, and there is too little interest of the purely musical kind to make it much worth while apart from the stage performance (D1633).

The Berlin Orchestra, conducted by Leo Blech, is heard also in Liszt's Polonaise No. 2, arranged by Muller-Burghaus. There is much good orchestral effect, but it is impossible at times to forget that the piece was written for the pianoforte, and to that extent the transcription is unsuccessful. With so much orchestral work available, transcriptions of pianoforte music should not be taken in hand without more justification than seems to be the case here (D1625).

From the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Stokowski, we have a couple of tit-bits from 'Carmen'—the Prelude to Act 1 and Entr'acte to Act 4. Nothing is lacking here in the way of vividness (E531).

When all is said concerning the merits of the amply-rehearsed (may we say sometimes the over-rehearsed?) foreign orchestras, the hearer must be indeed hard to please who wants anything better than the record of Mozart's 'Eine kleine Nachtmusik,' played by John Barbirolli's Chamber Orchestra. Here is perfect finish. The only fault is an over-keenness in the string tone in fortes, especially at the beginning. For the rest, this is a sheer delight in every way. The odd side in two records is filled by a Purcell Hornpipe, just a little less well played, I fancy, because something of the Purcellian directness and simplicity seem to be missing (C1655-56).

First-rate light stuff is a pair of Edward German's 'Nell Gwynne' dances—the Country Dance and Pastoral Dance, played by the New Symphony Orchestra under Malcolm Sargent. It is a little too keen in the string tone, and a trifle heavy here and there in the Pastoral Dance; otherwise excellent in every way (B2987).

Harpists, like violists, have some excuse for transcribing, seeing how slight is the provision of good solos for their instruments. Hence the justification for Mildred Dilling's choice of Debussy's Arabesque No. 1. A good deal of this is successful, but there is a lack of sonority in the bass, the harmony is sketchy, and there is an out-of-tune effect at times. On the other side of the record is a showy piece by Zabel, 'At the Spring.' This has the somewhat trivial, flimsy quality that we find in original music for the harp written by men who are players rather than composers. I don't know whether this description fits Zabel, but that is what the music suggests. The playing of this is excellent, though it doesn't convert me to the harp as a solo instrument save in very small doses of specially good and suitable music (C1642).

Arthur Rubinstein plays brilliantly Albeniz's 'Navarro' and 'Seville.' The tone is not always first-rate (DB1257).

A couple of extracts from 'Lohengrin' are sung by Fanelli and Tellini, sopranos, and Pertile, tenor, with the La Scala Orchestra of Milan, conducted by Carlo Sabajno. (To hear a couple of Elsa's on one record is a novel experience!) Of the three stars I prefer the sopranos. Pertile has a splendid voice, but the frequency with which he gets off the note will annoy the few of us who, in our pig-headed way, still think that purity of intonation and style do matter after all, even in opera (DB1218).

COLUMBIA

This month's notes must begin with the award of almost (if not quite) full marks to the recording of Brahms's Violin Concerto, played by Joseph Szigeti and the Hallé Orchestra under Sir Hamilton Harty. It would be difficult to name any serious flaw on the part of the soloist. More consistently pure intonation it would be difficult to find spread over so long a work; and his double-stopping is so easy and assured as to remove the touch of anxiety with which we usually listen to feats in this department. There is, however, far more than mere accuracy and good tuning. You will put on many a big-work fiddle recording before beating this for variety of mood, colour, and power. Szigeti even makes the long Cadenza seem pertinent. The orchestral part is at times just a shade less clear than would be the case in the concert hall. On the other hand, no concert performance could well exceed in brilliancy and all-round effect the orchestra's work in the Finale. The tenth side of the five records is very suitably filled by the slow movement of Brahms's D minor Sonata for violin (L2265-69).

A good sample of ballet music is that from Rabaud's opera 'Mârouf.' This is vivid, well-coloured stuff of the theatrical-Oriental brand, played with the right brilliancy by the Paris Orchestre Symphonique, conducted by the composer (9702-03).

The Madrid Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Fernandez Arbos, is recorded in 'La Procesion del Rocio,' a work full of delightful colour. Here the outstanding quality is the clarity of the recording in the quieter parts, where the effect at times is that almost of rich chamber music (9700).

A Clarinet Concerto by Weber is something of a novelty. (Apparently he wrote four such works.) One of these has been recorded as played by the band of the Garde Républicaine of France. It is mostly rather superficial, showy music, suggestive of the park band-stand rather than of the concert-room. The very agile soloist deserves to be named, but isn't (9699).

The Capet String Quartet continue their recording of Beethoven with the C sharp minor Quartet. I feel that they make too little of the Fugue. The pace is surely too slow, and the power too much on a dead level. The result is a feeling of monotony and dullness that ought not to exist in a performance of this tragic piece of writing. This same fault is apparent more or less throughout the earlier movements of the Quartet, and leads to loss of interest. But there are many good points. For example, the Presto is very neatly touched off, and the humour is there. The final Allegro has pace and passion. A moment or two of shaky intonation mid-way may be forgiven. On the whole, then, this is a performance and recording notable for refinement rather than for any other virtue (L2283-87).

A very pleasant and attractive record is that of the Nocturne from Borodin's Quartet No. 2, in D, played by the London String Quartet. Here is both polish and variety (L2278).

Naoum Blinder is a new-comer to the Columbia lists. He should speedily become a favourite, judging from his warmly expressive and all-round excellent playing of Tchaikovsky's 'Serenade Mélancolique' (9692).

In addition to the 'Mârouf' record mentioned above there is one giving a couple of vocal numbers, 'Il est des Musulmans' and 'La Caravane,' sung by Georges Thill, a tenor with an unusually rich and good voice and style (L2289).

The vocal records are of a good level on the singing side, though the music itself is not always of first-rate importance or interest. Here is a hasty survey of the batch: Gertrude Johnson in the 'Shadow Song' ('Dinorah') and 'Fondly within my heart enshrined' ('Traviata')—a pretty voice, always well-tuned and musical, and with good execution, but leaving one with a sense of lack on the dramatic side as the records go on (9709); Robert Poole, singing songs by Carn and Frank Bridge: here is a very sympathetic baritone voice of good range, with a delightful mezza-voce and unusually good phrasing and breath-control, and with most of his words coming through, too—altogether, singing above the average (5318); Clara Serena in two rather depressing songs by Stevenson and Russell: another exceptionally good voice, steady and expressive, and free from most contralto faults (5316); several operatic singers are recorded, the best of them being Tancredi Pasero, a fine bass, in an aria from 'La Gioconda'; on the same record is another air from the same work, sung by Alessandro Granda, a tenor with a magnificent voice but far too much portamento and scooping attack (L2301); Dora Labbette sings Spohr's 'Rose softly blooming' very prettily, and Arne's 'When daisies pied' less well. She misses the spring feeling, and suggests autumn rather. I do not like the weakly bowdlerised words. If we cannot sing Shakespeare's 'Cuckoo, O word of fear,' &c., let us leave the song alone (9704).

After 'Traviata,' 'Aida.' The former calls for some patience and tolerance on the part of a hearer who is not an operatic out-and-outer, but no indulgence is needed where 'Aida' is concerned. It is one of the comparatively small number of operas to which a self-respecting musician can listen without having to make allowances the whole time. The recording is on thirty-six sides, and obviously such a formidable undertaking cannot be discussed in detail. It gives one an impression of all-round level excellence. The records were made at Milan and the artists throughout are Italian—Giannina Arangi-Lombardi (Aida), Maria Capuana (Amneris), Aroldo Lindi (Radamès), Armando Borgioli (Amonasro), Tancredi Pasero (Ramphis), Salvatore Baccaloni (The King), and Giuseppi Nessi (Messenger). The chorus and orchestra are of La Scala, and the conductor is Lorenzo Molajoli. The chorus sings with the verve that we have now come to expect from the Scala body. All the soloists are good, my preference being for the bass, Tancredi Pasero. This 'Aida' is a remarkable recording achievement, and all that is needed for the perfect comfort and enjoyment of the gramophonist is a device by means of which the whole of these thirty-six sides could be made to turn themselves over, change the needle, and get going off their own bat. The records are in two albums, and there is a booklet containing a description of the opera, and a sensible prose translation of the libretto from the pen of Herman Klein. The Italian text is also given (9726-43).

BRUNSWICK

This month's parcel consists mainly of dance music. My dancing days being over, I have consigned these records to such members of my household as are interested in and capable of judging such vanities. They report a good average level of quality.

So far as real music is concerned, only two records call for notice. The Polovtsian Dances from 'Prince Igor' are excellently performed by the Cleveland Orchestra, conducted by Sokoloff. This is recording rather above the average, detail and colour being first-rate (10270-71).

Mario Chamlee sings a couple of extracts from 'Cavalleria Rusticana'—'Thy lips are like crimson berries' and the Drinking Song. I have to mention the scooping attack and a tendency to overdo the portamento, but, as I said above, such faults seem to be part of the natural equipment of operatic tenors—more 's the pity! The clarity of the orchestral playing in this record is a feature (10272).

NATIONAL GRAMOPHONIC SOCIETY

Here is something to be thankful for—a Schubert work both unhackneyed and delightful. The String Quartet in B flat has not hitherto been recorded, I think. How came the Centenarians to miss it? The International Quartet does it full justice, the only fault being a somewhat aggressive tone and style on the part of the leader at times. (This applies specially to the Minuet.) The slow movement is fine, and the final Presto all too short. The N.G.S. has scored with this set (124-126).

Player-Piano Notes

ÆOLIAN

Audiographic.—Here are four capital rolls. Debussy's 'Gardens in Rain' is well played by Robert Lortat, though he is a little heavy-handed in the quieter passages. The introduction is by Louis Vuillemin, and the running commentary by Markham Lee (D807).

Ethel Leginska does full justice to an attractive and brilliant 'Valse' by Moszkowski (Op. 34, No. 1). Maurice Jacquet has written an introduction, and there is a commentary by the staff (D837).

The D flat Prelude of Chopin, usually known as the 'Raindrop,' receives sympathetic and understanding treatment from Guiomar Novaes.

Ashton Jonson is responsible for the Introduction. Philip Conrad's commentary belies the 'raindrop' title, and will be rather too far-fetched for most people (D831).

Alexander Raab gives a delightfully clear and rhythmic performance of Mozart's Fantasia in D minor. There is an introduction by David Stanley Smith, and the staff supply the commentary (D833).

Duo-Art.—Geneviève Pitot's charmingly neat execution imparts a freshness to an old show-piece by Ascher on 'La Favorita' (7247).

Harold Bauer does all that is possible with Haydn's 'Gipsy Rondo,' but this ingenuous movement really needs the strings of the original Trio form (7254). A brilliant performance of Chopin's Valse in E flat (Op. 18), by Ignaz Friedman, is marred by spasmodic and uneven rhythm (7259).

There is a good march of Sousa's, 'The Dauntless Battalion,' played by Erlebach and Milne. Their pace is rather on the slow side. The piece gains considerably by a slight increase on the '75' marked on the roll (1906).

Hand-played.—Gitta Gradova gives a neat performance of Arensky's attractive Study in F sharp (A1157*e*).

Charles Adler has not made a good choice of material in Gounod's 'Funeral March of a Marionette.' The piece depends much upon the orchestration for the dryness and angularity of its effect; on the pianoforte it seems merely disjointed and clumsy (A1151*d*).

Chopin's Polonaise in C minor, played by Harold Bauer, gives the player-pianist some trouble. The right-hand accompanying chords are rather heavy, and the left-hand solo passages are therefore hard to bring out sufficiently without over-scaling the power. Otherwise the roll is good (A1155*f*).

Ethel Leginska chooses two of Mendelssohn's 'Songs without Words'—Nos. 10 and 44—and gives them the right simple and sympathetic performance (A1153*e*).

Metrostyle.—The player-pianist can spend an enjoyable time with German's 'Valse Gracieuse.' It is easy for the novice to manage, and at the same time offers sufficient scope to the more experienced player, besides being a charming piece of light music (T30429*c*).

Another well-edited roll which should give entire satisfaction is of Dohnànyi's Gavotte and 'Musette,' the latter being particularly delightful (T39427*b*).

For those who care for this style of thing there is Bohm's "Carillon," which can be made quite effective in spite of its unoriginality and somewhat old-fashioned sentimentality (T30426*b*).

Wireless Notes

By 'ARIEL'

The thoughtful writer of the broadcasting notes in the Observer, speaking of the Parry programme, made the suggestion that there is a good deal of excellent British music of that school waiting a better show than it has so far received. He mentions especially the admirable chamber music of Charles Wood, a composer whose instrumental works, so far as I remember, have had no show at the hands of the B.B.C. There is also the chamber music of Stanford awaiting a turn; and what of the works written by Sir Alexander Mackenzie before the toils of administrative and educational activities practically applied the closure to his creative side? Some of the lesser men of that revival period are also worth a thought—Hurlestone, Hamish MacCunn, and others. The fact is, there is a natural tendency to concentrate either on living composers or on those of about a century ago. The men between are just far enough back to be overlooked, and are not sufficiently remote to suggest the adventure of a revival. However, one must not complain. Week after week the programmes are giving us all kinds of music that we should never hear at all if we were dependent entirely on the concert hall. This is natural enough, and I do not blame the concert-givers. The box-office has to be considered, and the names on the programme must be such as will draw an audience. But the fact remains that one of the most striking things the B.B.C. has done is to show the comparatively restricted field in which the concert-hall activities have moved. When we have made our due reverence to the first-grade composers, let us give due credit to the second- and third-raters—even the fifth-raters—who on occasion somehow managed to turn out excellent stuff that has been neglected in the past merely because it was not signed by Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, and the other top-notchers.

The People's Palace Symphony Concerts have relayed uncommonly well. I have rarely, if ever, heard better transmission than that of the Bach-Beethoven concert on May 2. Incidentally, it is good to learn that the attendance at these concerts has been large, and that it was especially big on this Bach-Beethoven night. Certainly there was no mistaking the enthusiasm, especially after the performance of Bach's D minor Clavier Concerto with Harriet Cohen at the keyboard. Apparently the B.B.C. is building up a substantial concert public in the East End. I am aware that a good deal of music-making has taken place at the People's Palace for many years past, but it has not (I think) usually taken the form of Symphony Concerts.

Most annoyingly my set went on strike so far as 5GB was concerned, on May 8, when Arthur Bliss's new work was relayed from Bishopsgate Institute. I hear from a reliable source, however, that it transmitted well. This does not surprise me, for an examination of the score suggested that it was just the kind of clear-cut, definite music that does invariably come through well. I understand that the admirable singing of the Harold Brooke Choir (who seem to have been at the very top of their form on this occasion) received more adequate justice than is usually the lot of choral-singing when broadcast. The relaying of this new work reminds me of a point in favour of broadcast music that has not so far been sufficiently recognised, apparently. Talking the other day to a busy music teacher, I asked him if he made much use of his wireless set. He said, 'Yes; it is a real boon. Before I installed my set I found I was less in touch with musical happenings than my own pupils. They could go to concerts, while my opportunities were very rare indeed. Now I can switch on and hear all manner of interesting things at odd half-hours that in the ordinary way

I should have to miss.' What this means to a teacher can be imagined. He can no longer be excused for getting into a groove. With very little cost of time and money (far less than he would have paid in the old days for an occasional concert) he may now be abreast of new and revived music, and, moreover, keep a constant standard of performance on tap for the benefit of himself and his pupils.

A word of praise is due to the excellent musical and other sound effects in the two performances of 'The Prisoner of Zenda.' The gradual emergence and disappearance of music was especially striking and suggestive. Here is a hint for the future composers of broadcast opera. Such a use of music can surely act as a kind of bridge between spoken dialogue and song. In any case, it beats the normal melodrame, because of the infinite fineness with which it can be shaded off. There is, moreover, a far greater feeling of remoteness and mystery about it. 'The Prisoner of Zenda' made a good broadcast play, but I felt that at times it was too plentifully sprinkled with 'damns.' In a play, as in real life, an occasional damn is effective, whereas a bagful simply suggests a lack of resource in vocabulary.

The Times has lately had a good deal of correspondence on the vocal wobble. As usual, B.B.C. singers came in for some well-justified condemnation. As this implied a reproach to the B.B.C. musical advisers, I was not surprised to see a letter in reply from Mr. Percy Pitt. He pointed out that gramophone recording and wireless transmission tended to exaggerate rather than minimise the fault. Singers who are only very slightly guilty when doing normal platform work are apt to become super-wobblers when facing the 'mike,' especially the more nervous ones. Mr. Pitt added that the B.B.C., when instructing singers in microphone technique, makes a special point of trying to cure the fault. Many incurable singers are rejected for this reason. One is glad to hear the B.B.C. defence, because the amount of wobble lately has been truly distressing. It seems hard to believe that the Corporation could deliberately engage singers who show so complete a failure to manage one of the fundamentals of singing. The Times correspondent distributed the blame in a variety of directions. Curiously, nobody blames the chief culprit—that is, the general public. I believe that when concert audiences resolutely withhold applause—or even take the positive line of expressing disapproval—after hearing a bad case of wobbling, the evil will disappear. At present the wobbling voice receives as much applause as the steady one, despite the fact that the very people who applaud will, if tackled squarely, admit that they hate the tremolo. It is all a part of our foolish soft-heartedness when public performers are concerned. We kill them with too much kindness. A very bad example of wobbling was relayed from Covent Garden on May 14 in an Act of 'Siegfried,' when Madame Ohms sang badly in almost every way, and especially in regard to unsteadiness of tone. She was roundly taken to task by some critics for the same faults in the 'Twilight of the Gods' a night or two later. But what I want to know is this: Did the audience at Covent Garden show the slightest sign of disapproval, either negative or positive? I doubt it. So long as singers can wobble, sing out of tune, shriek, howl, and bellow, and 'get away with it,' so long, of course, they will continue to do so. The Times discussions have contained some quaint theories as to the cause of the wobble. The most amusing was that of Lord Knutsford, who, in the issue of May 15, said: 'The reason why singers vibrate is because they are unable to keep true on the note, and wish to disguise their failing—or, in the case of tenors, to prevent bursting. I have had to do it myself in whistling when my lips gave out.'

It was a capital move to give English hearers a chance of hearing Joseph Bonnet daily for a week. The Bishopsgate Institute organ broadcasts well, and the Franck works had a very good show, so far as I can gather from other listeners and from my own hearing on several evenings. On the whole, it is clear that the organ is getting a better chance to-day than at any previous time since broadcasting began. This is an important matter, because only a comparatively small proportion of the population hear the organ in the ordinary way; and as gramophone records are still a long way off giving adequate results, the repertory of the instrument must remain a sealed book unless helped by wireless. Critics affect to sniff at the organ repertory, but those who play the instrument know that it contains much fine music of a sterling character that stands any amount of repetition, mainly because of its architectonic construction and intellectual character. Moreover, the broadcasting of organ music by good performers must be an enormous help to struggling players in remote centres where lessons are difficult to come by, and where there are few opportunities of hearing good players. Some day, perhaps, the B.B.C. will join hands with the R.C.O. in arranging for a few broadcast recitals of the pieces set for the College examinations. These pieces are chosen from the best things in the repertory, ancient and modern, and so would interest the ordinary listener; and their performance would be a valuable lesson to many prospective candidates.

Everyman of May 9 contained an article by Frank Merry on Bach's Cantatas. It consisted chiefly of an attack on the B.B.C. for their weekly performances of these works. Mr. Merry speaks of 'having to listen to the Cantatas every Sunday for the rest of one's existence.' But there is no question of having to listen to anything. It is as easy to switch off at the beginning of a Cantata as at the start of any other objectionable item. Mr. Merry makes some curious remarks concerning the level achieved by Bach and Beethoven. 'Bach,' he says, 'is not a composer like Beethoven, whose every published opus reveals a certain level of inspiration, below which the composer does not sink.' Let Mr. Merry look down the list of Beethoven's works in 'Grove' and see what a comparatively small proportion—smaller, I fancy, than that of any other composer of first rank—retains its place in the repertory. Why? Mr. Merry goes on to say that a quarter of Bach's output is on the highest level of musical inspiration, but 'a great deal of the remainder is mere exercise stuff, of nothing more than a certain scholastic interest, and in performance as dead as mutton.' Again I suggest that Mr. Merry should look down a list of Bach's complete works and see what an astonishingly large proportion is still very much alive.

However, my main point is to combat Mr. Merry's grouse about the weekly performances of the Cantatas. Evidently he doesn't like them, but I have substantial evidence that a very large number of listeners appreciate the performances, and conductors and singers especially use them as a means of obtaining information concerning the style, degree of difficulty, and other characteristics of works, many of which were practically unknown in this country until the B.B.C. undertook this tremendous enterprise. Mr. Merry says that 'Sir Henry Wood, with a carefully-selected body of voices and instrumentalists and, perhaps, three months' rehearsal, could be relied upon to make a really nice job of a Bach Cantata.' This is true, but at the rate of four a year (really less, because of course the rehearsals would not go on during the whole year), Sir Henry would require rather more than fifty years to give us a chance of hearing practically all the Cantatas. (There are so few that fall below a good level that almost all of the whole two hundred would have to be prepared.) This is another example of the best being the enemy of the good. It is better to make acquaintance with the lot (even if some performances are not first-rate) than to hear a few done perfectly and remain ignorant of the bulk.

I must spare a line for the extraordinarily vivid little concert given in the Studio on May 17 by the Wireless Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Oskar Fried. More brilliant playing than that in the quick movements in the 'Nutcracker' Suite I do not expect to hear, and Mozart's E flat Symphony also had a delightful performance. Even our old friend, the Overture to 'The Caliph of Bagdad,' was galvanised into an unwonted state of vitality.

Humour still seems to be the most variable feature of the programmes. During the past few weeks we have had examples of the heights and depths to which broadcast humour can extend. On the credit side must be placed some excellent work by Mabel Constanduros, Clapham and Dwyer, and Leonard Henry. It is long since I have been more amused than by the Clapham and Dwyer skit on the broadcasting of the English Cup Final. This was foolery of the very best description, and it was above all notable for its delightful air of improvisation. It might have been a bit of impromptu guying by a couple of pals in the intimacy of the domestic circle. A well-known humorist—I forget his name—writing recently in the Daily News, said that audible laughter is evoked only in the music-hall or wherever crowds of people are gathered together; it could not be caused by broadcast humour. I am sure many listeners will agree with me in saying that he was wrong. Certainly on the occasion of this Clapham and Dwyer skit self and partner laughed to such an extent that we almost drowned the loud-speaker.

On the other side of the balance sheet must be placed some deplorable performances. We have had, for example, a very weak pair of American Hebrews, retailing jokes that were either stale or dull, and sometimes both. And the so-called 'harmonising and syncopating' parties have been very poor. One pair of duettists perpetrated an artistic crime that certainly ought not to have been allowed. They were announced to sing three numbers, including a Lullaby. The pair consisted of a soprano and a kind of tenor who added a quavering and apparently impromptu descant to the lady's part. So long as they were concerned with transatlantic 'song hits' this would not have mattered. But when the Lullaby came on, it proved to be Cyril Scott's well-known song. So miserable was the travesty that it had gone on a minute or so before I realised that Cyril Scott was the victim. The rhythm was distorted, the soprano gave a fairly good imitation of the melody but was deplorably out of tune, and the tenor wove an arabesque that can only be described as desolating. One naturally asks a question: Was this programme tried at Savoy Hill before being performed? If so, the Lullaby should have been barred. If not, it is clear that only contributors of proved ability should be allowed a free hand.

A MODERN APPROACH TO MUSIC-TEACHING:

V.—RHYTHM—ITS HISTORICAL AND PSYCHOLOGICAL ASPECTS

By Norah H. Bore

I do not propose in this article to discuss the nature of rhythm. That has already been done by other writers in this paper. It will, however, be necessary before considering our psychological reactions to rhythm and their application to teaching, to define certain terms which I shall use.

First of all a clear distinction between metre and rhythm must be recognised. The bar-line showing the metrical accent marks the confines of the former; the phrasing marks indicate the units of the latter. Metre is a natural phenomenon which we notice in the beating of our heart, in the vibrations of sound-waves, in the cycle of day and night. We obey a fundamental law of Nature when we group sounds into recurrent units of two or three beats.*

Rhythm is not this metrical pulsation. It is rather a pattern which we weave round metre, subtly varied from it by minute deviations of shape and pulse, which arrests and holds our attention by the recurrent surprise of the relationships which it establishes.

Rhythm could not exist without this groundwork of metre, which can be compared with the evenly woven canvas on which we embroider our rhythmic arabesques. It has been excellently defined by Mr. E. J. D. Radclyffe as a 'deviation from a central pattern or principle of concealed metre.' It is in this sense that I wish to use the term.

It is possible to approach the study of rhythm in two ways. We may consider it in its historical background, or in relation to the psychological reactions it arouses in us.

* The psychological experiment (Bollon's) which establishes this fact is excellently described in 'The Borderland of Music and Psychology.' By F. Howes (p. 89).

The first is an interesting angle for the teacher, since modern educational theory favours the opinion that the development of the child follows that of the race. If this be so, it is important to consider rhythm from this point of view. It should enable us to judge at what stage of the child's development we may expect him to be capable of perceiving and appreciating rhythm.

We shall have to seek far back in the ages if we ask ourselves where are the beginnings of rhythm. The study of primitive man shows that rhythm played a large part in the lives of primitive peoples. At first it was doubtless associated with social needs such as combination for offensive and defensive purposes, which it facilitated by its powers of co-ordinated action. This is the origin of the savage war-dance. It has been established by the investigations of primitive drawings that simple instruments such as the tom-tom figure in the art of an early stage of civilization. By the study of backward races to-day we find that a low stage of culture can be accompanied by considerable development of rhythmic sense. This fact has emerged from the investigations of Dr. C. S. Myers, who visited the natives of Sarawak and made phonographic records of their music. He discovered that their rhythmic combinations had far outstripped those of our Western music. It took him weeks of concentrated study to arrive at any possible solution of the intricacies of the rhythmic combinations which he had recorded.*

The direct physical and emotional appeal of rhythm gave it a value of its own to primitive man. Dancing—the physical expression of rhythm—became associated with worship, which is the response of the human being to something beyond his purely physical nature. This was probably the beginning of what we now know as the æsthetic faculty.

Apply these facts to the child, and we see that rhythm is an integral part of his early life. The primary element of metre, which rhythm presupposes, awakens a response even in his earliest years. The baby is soothed by the rocking of his cradle; he listens spellbound to the ticking of his father's watch. At a surprisingly early age he drums out a metrical pattern upon a tray or mug. It would be interesting by careful observation to establish the stages at which a child is first capable (a) of perceiving a metrical pattern and (b) or reproducing a metrical pattern. It is evident that he must have acquired that facility by the time he walks, since the metrical basis of walking is simple duple time.

In this sense we are all musical. The physical basis of rhythm is an inherent one to which we make an intuitive response. A deaf person can feel sound-vibrations rhythmically. Miss Helen Keller is a striking example of this. The so-called tone-deaf person is probably a case of arrested musical development; his musical development corresponds to that of primitive man. Provided that the subject in question has no aural abnormalities, the psycho-analyst should be able to discover the cause which hinders the free development of such latent musical capacities.

By the time the child is capable of rapping out a postman's knock on the front door he has evolved one stage further in rhythmic development, and he has apprehended rhythm as I define the term. He feels progress towards some point of climax or repose, not merely metrical pattern. If he can reproduce this rhythm this faculty is fully developed, since this act requires not only the reproduction of a simple rhythm but motor and tactual co-ordination with this act.

The child is capable of creating a rhythmic pattern earlier than he can imitate one, since, if it is to be remembered, the latter action requires some sort of mental analytic process. Here again an interesting series of tests might be worked out to establish the average age at which the child arrives at this stage. Experiments carried out in a Kindergarten (average age five) showed that single-bar rhythms, containing half-, one-, or two-pulse notes, could be reproduced at ease by children of four to five years old.

How soon can a child apprehend a rhythmic curve or sweep of average difficulty? The lack of this capacity is the constant thorn in the side of the instrumental teacher. Is there not a danger that by teaching an instrument too soon and by focussing children's attention upon muscular co-ordination with metrical pulses we tend to arrest normal development of this faculty? M. Jaques-Dalcroze and Dr. Yorke Trotter are working upon the right lines here. It is most important to train the child from the very first in the apprehension of the musical unit as a whole. This is quite an easy matter, and presents no more difficulty than the apprehension of a sentence, provided we do so by intuitive methods and not by intellectual analysis. The child learns a line of poetry as a whole, not by the grammatical function of each word or the numerical order of the units: so too with a musical phrase. There is great need for more definite teaching along these lines, in the individual instrumental lesson as well as in the aural training class.

What, finally, is the musical function of rhythm? Dr. McEwen, answering this question in his book 'The Thought in Music,' says, 'It is the element which gives continuity and musical unity to a succession of sounds.' This fact can be tested by taking any familiar melody with a well-defined rhythm, such as 'Coming thro' the Rye,' and experimenting with it. Change or omit the rhythm and it at once becomes evident that the musical entity has changed, the significance has been lost or altered.

Teachers familiar with aural training work have frequent evidence of this. Melodic intervals well known to the pupil become unrecognisable in a new rhythmic setting. It is for this reason that it is most necessary to associate pitch and rhythm in the earliest stages of such work.

Rhythm is thus the essence of music. It is the quality of progression or movement which gives a sense of coherency and unity to a succession of single tonal or metrical units. This being so, it is most important that the teacher should cultivate this faculty in his pupils by every means in his power.

He will be greatly aided in this if he has realised the physical basis of all reactions to rhythm.

* 'A Study of Rhythm in Primitive Music.' By C. S. Myers. 'Brit. Journal Psychology,' 1905. Side by side with this fact we may note the tendencies of modern jazz music. This music—negro in origin—is the development of the musical expression of a slave race, and therefore of a backward one. Here, once again, we are confronted by specialisation in rhythmic device. In this case it is along the lines of delayed strong pulses or syncopation, which has here developed a more characteristic expression than that achieved by similar effects in European music.

These reactions may be expressed or repressed, but they are undoubtedly present in us all. Their free cultivation should do much to heighten the musical perception of the pupil. M. Dalcroze has evolved in his Eurhythmics a very sound method of tackling this problem. Music teachers should provide similar opportunities, not only in the Kindergarten but at all stages of their pupils' musical career, for physical rhythmic expression. This is the form in which rhythm can be most naturally expressed, and it is therefore by this means that it can be most freely developed.

EASY PIANOFORTE MUSIC

A number of albums and pieces suitable for teaching purposes come from Joseph Williams. Two useful Handel volumes provide a capital selection of pieces arranged from the figured bass by C. S. Lang. Book 1 contains six marches and dance movements from 'Flavius,' 'Terpsichore,' 'Berenice' (the well-known Minuet), and 'Judas Maccabæus,' and six pieces from the 'Water Music' make up a rather more difficult second book (Lower). Two Album Leaves by G. O'Connor-Morris, 'The Little Songster' and 'Elfin Sprites,' would suit pupils of Lower and Higher Grade respectively. They are issued separately.

No. 1 of 'Three Pieces,' by Gordon Jacob—'The Dancing Doll'—requires neat, quick finger-work, mostly staccato (Lower). No. 2, 'Evening Mood,' has slow cantabile work, sometimes in strings of sixths, for the left hand, while the right hand repeats throughout a simple arpeggio figure (Lower). In No. 3, 'The Bluebottle' (a little study), the hands—R.H. on white notes, L.H. on black—alternate throughout in double notes. It makes a good study in 'hand' staccato (Intermediate). Dorothy Harris's 'Boat Song' is suitably flowing and tuneful (Lower). Arthur Baynon's 'The Fancy Tree' contains five pieces which make an attractive and well-varied set (Elementary—Lower). Four pieces under the title 'Midsummer Sketches,' by Madeleine Evans, provide pleasant and useful practice, including pedalling and cantabile work for both hands (Lower). J. Meredith Tatton's 'Two Little Dances' (in ancient style) comprise a simple, tuneful little Minuet and a more difficult Gavotte. In one or two places in the right-hand part of the Gavotte something has gone wrong with the fingering. Also, in this movement, a most unnecessary 'hold-up' occurs between the different sections; the elimination of the rests at these points would surely be an improvement (Lower—Higher).

Thomas F. Dunhill's 'Playmates'—two pieces, 'On a spring morning' and 'Confidences'—may be recommended. The first (molto allegro, leggiero) needs a light, staccato touch; the other is a graceful little 'Allegretto' (Lower—Higher). Pleasant and rhythmical, and of similar grade, R. H. Walthew's 'Two Pastels'—'A Lace Handkerchief' and 'The Courtier' (in Gavotte style)—give both hands good practice in fluent legato work (Paxton). Two attractive pieces by Adam Carse—'Album Leaf' (a flowing allegretto in 3-4 time) and 'Valse Coquette' (vivo)—will appeal to young people (Lower—Higher). The publishers (Augener) issue also 'Play-time Pieces' for pianoforte or for two pianofortes, by Henry Coleman. There are twelve pieces in two books, so designed that while each piece is complete in itself as a solo, they may also be played in pairs on two pianofortes. Thus, Nos. 1 and 7 work together, and so on. Book 1 is of elementary grade, and the second book a grade higher.

Three useful albums come from Keith Prowse. 'In the chimney corner,' by Thomas F. Dunhill, is an admirably designed little Suite of four pieces (Lower). 'Over the hills,' by T. Robin MacLachlan, contains three tuneful pieces, each preceded by preparatory exercises (Lower). Mathilde Bilbro's 'Six Melodic Etudes' deal with simple technical problems in agreeable fashion (Elementary—Lower). Four pieces under the title 'Fancy Free,' by William Alwyn (Oxford University Press), are modern in style and, especially 'Snowdrops' and 'Twilight,' need intelligent and sensitive playing (Lower—Higher). 'An Empire Cruise'—six descriptive pieces by Dudley Glass (Murdoch)—should make an easy appeal to young players (Elementary).

'Single-handed Pieces and Studies,' by F. Percival Driver (Boosey), are issued in four graded volumes, with accompanying technical exercises, fingering, and pedalling, by Gertrude Azulay. The third volume (medium grade) contains four attractive pieces—Toccata, Waltz Tune, and Lament, for L.H., and Minuet for R.H. The same publishers send a new edition of Donald Gray's 'The Musical Gateway'—very first pianoforte lessons. Those who want an easy, carefully-graded book for beginners might look at this. The little tunes and exercises are all of a kind to secure correct technical habits from the first.

Keith Prowse send a handy little 'Practice Register,' which includes blank staves and space for teacher's comments, &c., a list of musical terms, and a chronological chart of the lives of the great composers.

POINTS FROM LECTURES

To people who dislike Bach, Mr. James Ching had a few words to say at Southampton. Bach's music was the climax of the great contrapuntal school, the lecturer said, but it also began the harmonic school, which had lasted down to the present day; and in his first Prelude Bach anticipated two Chopin Etudes. Some of the reasons why one ought to learn to like Bach were: (1) it was intrinsically beautiful music; (2) it developed musicianship and the power of analysis; (3) it developed more than any other music the power of tone-control—the control of every note in every tune; (4) it was very interesting historically; and (5) it was nearly always wanted for examinations.

An Easter Holiday School was held at Taunton School under Somerset Festival and other auspices. In one of the lectures Mr. Cyril Winn said that, just as young children needed plenty of reading-books for learning to read their own language, so they similarly needed sight-reading books to familiarise them with the language of music. Sight-reading in large classes was useless; in small groups it was preferable in every way. Ear-training was equally important, and should include appreciation, not only of pitch and rhythm, but of colour as well. There was no reason why children should not be encouraged to write down the music they heard as early as possible. At least, before they left school they should be able to sing what they could write, and write what they could sing. A lot of nonsense was talked about musical appreciation, which invariably implied a mechanical instrument of some kind that reproduced the music. The fact was that every music lesson, whether singing, sight-reading, or ear-training, should be a lesson in musical appreciation.

Canon Dwelly, of Liverpool Cathedral, met a number of Cathedral organists during a conference at the Liverpool Chapter House, and referred to relationships between organists and chapters. He said that they had not always pulled together in the spirit of a mutual concern. The clergy in particular had not realised that good music was in itself an act of worship. As a preacher himself, he was persuaded that worship was more dependent on the organist and the choir than on the preacher. He would like to see that view expressed to the bishops at the Lambeth Conference. 'Most of the bishops, so far as I know them,' Canon Dwelly added, 'do not know what good music is. We are lucky in this diocese in having a bishop who knows good music and encourages it. But the bishops generally have not the time to get right down to it.' Cathedral organists would help matters if they demanded of the whole Church that music should take its place in evoking the spirit of worship in every one.

The Catholic point of view of Church music was put forward at Connaught Hall, Newcastle-on-Tyne, by Dr. E. J. Sloane, when addressing the district centre of the Organists' Union. 'Church music,' he said, 'should be written round the words of the service, so as to assist worshippers in their devotion, music that is steadily melodious and simple in its execution. Therein lay the cause of the failure of the greatest composers in Church compositions. The great Masses of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Weber, and even that of Bach, fail by reason of their very greatness. The composers missed completely that note of simplicity which is essential to the religious devotion of the people, but yet these same composers have left striking examples of real Church music to show that, when they chose to forget their art, they could equal and even excel the mediæval masters by sheer beauty of melody and harmony. A sound policy,' Dr. Sloane added, 'is to advocate a return to Plainsong, which is the ideal music, not distracting or operatic, but simple and devotional, and which is still part of the official music of the Church.'

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

Questions must be of general musical interest. They must be stated simply and briefly, and if several are sent, each must be written on a separate slip. Our 'Answers to Correspondents' Column closes on the 14th of the month. We cannot undertake to reply by post.

TROMBONI.—You ask how we can make our reply last month agree with our attacks on certain diploma-granting institutions. We see nothing illogical. Our words were: 'We are not opposed to money-making concerns, provided the money is not made by fraud.' As we are convinced that certain diploma-granting institutions make money by practices which (to put it mildly) do not commend themselves to us, we are opposed to them. The attacks on those institutions do not result from jealousy, but from a desire to protect qualified teachers from unfair competition. We ourselves have no axe to grind, as we do not teach, nor are we connected with any institution that does. Indeed, so far from axe-grinding, this journal loses annually a considerable sum by refusing to insert advertisements of institutions which, in the opinion of its publishers, are not worthy of the support they seek.

N. M.—Without hearing your voice, we cannot give an opinion. We don't think you need worry about not being able to sing high easily if you are a real contralto. An easy top G belongs to sopranos and mezzos. But certainly you ought to have a good top E flat and E. Your middle and lower registers are exceptional, you say. Apparently you are forcing the middle register up too far instead of developing the top one. If your present teacher can't help you on this point, get a second opinion.

NOVICE.—You raise a point that no doubt worries a good many conductors of competitive choirs. You say that although Stanford marks his 'Corydon, arise,' at ♩=72, yet the Glasgow Orpheus, when broadcasting from Queen's Hall, sang it at about ♩=116. You assume that Stanford knew what he wanted, so why should the pace he set be so much increased? We didn't hear the Glasgow choir's performance, so we are unable to say whether its pace justified itself. Certainly the difference between 72 and 116 seems to exceed the latitude that performers may reasonably claim. As to your concern about the attitude of adjudicators: we don't think you will find them insisting on anything more than an approximation to the metronome mark. They will merely give their view as to whether a performance is too slow or too quick for the style, mood, and effect of the piece. As to 'Where'er you walk,' you forget that the metronome didn't exist in Handel's day; the marking is therefore that of a mere editor. Editions differ so widely in this matter that you can afford to disregard any suggestion that fails to convince you after due thought and experiment. The whole question of pace is as difficult as it is vital; and this being so, it may be regarded as one of the crucial tests of a performer's musicality and taste. In the long run, the proof of the pudding, &c. Go on using your discretion, and having done so, have the courage of your opinion. It may cost you a few failures, but you will learn much from them.

H. W. C.—From the fact that the basses of the Dayton Choir were exceptionally fine you seem inclined to deduce that the normal American bass is better than the normal bass elsewhere. But you must not forget that the Dayton singers were picked from a body of students hailing from all over the States. It would be easy to find their match if an English choir selected its basses from some hundreds of men drawn from the whole of the country—or even from any one county other than Rutland (and perhaps even from thence).

BACH.—(1.) We haven't space for the quotation of the passage and its fingering. But isn't your edition of the 'Forty-eight' fingered? If not, you should use one that is. Get the Novello edition, which is by far the best from all practical points of view. (2.) Consecutive fifths are not now 'absolutely taboo.' On the contrary, they are now so over-used a convention that we wish they could again be banned. As you say, much depends on whether they 'sound all right.' But those you quote don't.

C. P. E.—You say that Sunday motoring upsets the balance of your choir to such an extent that harmonized anthems are impossible. You ask for an alternative, such as unison anthems. We know of none. Your best plan is to choose examples in which a good deal of unison occurs, and wherein there are no passages for unaccompanied voices in harmony. The only other alternatives are: (1.) to give up anthems altogether; (2.) to screw up the attendance of your choir; or (3.) to scrap the lot.

J. S. (Wigan).—(1.) We have not a copy of the piece by us, so we cannot give you 'a suggested method of pedalling.' But we should imagine that a player able to tackle a work of its degree of difficulty would know all that need be known about the pedalling of it. (2.) Similarly, he ought to know the meaning of the sign ▽ over a note. It signifies that the note should have a little extra weight, and also be detached.

G. E. C. asks where he can obtain a copy of Young's 'Phyllis has such charming graces' as the composer wrote it. (He has the Lane Wilson arrangement.) If unpublished, is the original in any get-at-able library or museum?

A.R.C.M. asks for an anthology of poetical and other literary quotations on music. We know that such a work exists, for we once had a valued copy. But we lent it, so we have it no longer. We have even lost the title. Can a reader help?

TIMID.—If the Sonata you have transcribed is a copyright work you must not give a public performance of your arrangement without the permission of the publisher.

T. H. C.—For a clear exposition of what is known as the 'Bel Canto,' read Herman Klein's 'The Bel Canto' (Oxford University Press, 3*s.* 6*d.*).

H. E. N.—Apparently there is no article or programme note dealing in a detailed manner with Elgar's Organ Sonata.

Church and Organ Music

ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS

ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING

The annual general meeting will be held on Saturday, July 20, at 2.15 p.m. Members only.

DISTRIBUTION OF DIPLOMAS

Members and friends are cordially invited to the distribution of diplomas by the President, Dr. E. C. Bairstow, at 3 p.m., on Saturday, July 20. There will be an organ recital by Mr. Herbert Walton, organist of Glasgow Cathedral, and the President will deliver an address, after which the usual conversazione will be held. No tickets are required. The doors will be open for the distribution at 2.45 p.m.

Candidates for Associateship selecting group 2 of the set pieces are particularly requested to see that they have the correct Chorale Prelude by Bach, and to check the publishers' references, as follows: 'Nun komm, der Heiden Heiland,' in G minor (Novello, Book 17, p. 49; Augener, p. 934; Peters, vol. 7, No. 46).

H. A. HARDING

THE ANGLO-AMERICAN CONFERENCE AT LAUSANNE

We hope that organists and choirmasters, and all who are interested in Church music, will not overlook the advantages, educational and social, promised at this important event. Already a large attendance from both sides of the Atlantic is assured, and among those present will be many prominent musicians representative of practically every branch of the profession. The lecturers and consultants in the Church Music Section will include Sir Richard Terry, Dr. E. C. Bairstow, Dr. Sydney Nicholson, Dr. Henry Ley, and others. It is hoped to arrange for daily recitals on the Cathedral organ, which has been kindly placed at the disposal of the Conference by the Cathedral authorities. Among the players will be Dr. Bairstow and Dr. H. G. Ley, and it is expected that one or two prominent American recitalists will be heard. Dr. Sydney Nicholson will bring along the choir-boys of St. Nicolas College, Chislehurst, who will be available for demonstrations in choir-training, and also for the performance of illustrations. A small body of adult singers is being organized to co-operate with the boys in performances of representative types of English Church music.

We are glad to hear that Sir Henry Hadow has now announced his intention of being present, if possible. His interest in Church music has been shown often by lectures and writings, and although his presence will be an immense asset to the Conference generally, it will above all, we think, be appreciated by the Church Music Section. Readers who have not yet decided as to attendance at the Conference should make up their minds now, as the best accommodation will soon be booked. For full particulars write to the Registrar, 2, Albany Court Yard, Piccadilly, W.1.

AN ORGAN STORM WITH LIGHTNING EFFECTS

Thunder on the organ has long been a commonplace, and lightning has often been suggested by means of high-pitched stops and rapid passages. At a recital given by Mr. Arthur Meale at Earlsdon Wesleyan Church recently, a new touch of realism was introduced. In the local paper we read:

> 'The audience were tremendously enthusiastic when Mr. Meale came to that portion of the programme when he played a number of his own compositions. . . . The final dramatic tone-picture, "The Storm," a remarkably clever piece, also composed by the player, included realistic effects of the thunder, while the accompanying lightning was obtained by placing the church in darkness and flashing the electric light.'

Well, we are progressing. Mr. Meale must now go ahead and complete the illusion by adding a few boxes of dried peas to represent the hail, and some skilful play on the windows and roof by means of hose pipes for rain effects. The paper we have quoted said that 'Mr. Meale had chosen his programme with an eye to showing off the organ.' It looks very much as if the showing-off of Mr. Meale was also a part of the scheme. But those flashes of the electric light make us inclined to suggest that 'showing-up' would perhaps be a better term.

Messrs. Novello have just issued a supplementary organ catalogue containing details of a large selection from the best works of the most prominent foreign composers, issued by Continental publishers. The references include also a number of works by English composers published abroad. All these are obtainable from Messrs. Novello. The catalogue contains practically everything of value in its special line, and is an interesting publication. For example, until one sees the list one would hardly have expected that as many as about thirty of Saint-Saëns's works have been arranged for organ, mostly by French musicians such as Gigout, Busser, Guilmant, and Renaud. Nor is it generally known that Salomé wrote not merely one set of ten pieces, but two sets of ten, two sets of twelve, and a set of twelve Versets on the Magnificat. We note, too, that Karg-Elert has now well over a hundred pieces to his credit. Organists who wish to maintain a good repertory should send for this catalogue and keep it by them for reference.

A promising sign of the times is the revival of Choir Festivals by large bodies of singers gathered from a wide area. Much good, however, may be done in a far more modest way. For example, we have received particulars of a combined Choir Festival of a very minute but valuable character. It was held at Hartburn Church, Northumberland, and consisted of two choirs, those of Hartburn and Netherwitton, totalling thirty-two mixed voices, augmented by twelve boys from the Church of the Holy Spirit, Newcastle. This little body of forty-four voices sang Geoffrey Shaw's 'Spring bursts to-day,' Bairstow's 'Save us, O Lord,' an anonymous Elizabethan Motet, 'O quam suavis,' arranged by Hughes, and Stainer's 'Awake, thou that sleepest.' Plainsong was used for the Office Hymn and the Canticles. Solos were sung by Miss I. Wight and Mr. Baker. There was a large congregation, Mr. Dixon, sen., conducted, and Mr. Dixon, jun., played the organ.

ASSOCIATION OF OLD CHORISTERS OF ST. GEORGE'S, WINDSOR

On St. George's Day (April 23), nineteen members of this Association gathered in the Chapter Library, Windsor Castle, for their annual meeting, Dr. E. H. Fellowes, vice-president, taking the chair. The Old Boys took tea with Sir Walford Davies, and had a short rehearsal for the afternoon service in the Chapel. During the procession of the choir the Old Boys sang the unison chorus from Bach's 'Sleepers, wake!' Mr. Hubert Hunt playing the violin counter-theme. The service was Goss in A, sung by the combined choirs, and the anthem, Hunt's 'God hath not appointed us to wrath,' was sung by the St. George's Choir. Sir Walford Davies conducted, and Mr. Malcolm Boyle was at the organ. The officiant was an Old Boy, the Rev. S. G. B. Exham. The members present were Messrs. F. C. Willis, C. J. King, Fred Smith, H. W. Walker, W. Hughes, P. A. Hughes, R. S. Hughes (from New York), Sir Walford Davies, J. W. Hammond, H. W. Hunt, R. Fisher, C. B. Rushton, H. Carver, F. C. Freeman, Rev. D. G. Bishop, A. W. Burford, J. Walmsley, W. A. Ames (hon. treasurer), and J. E. Stilliard. The hon. secretary, Mr. J. E. Stilliard, Barclay's Bank, Eton, will be glad to learn the addresses of any Old Boys.

OLD CHORISTERS OF ST. GEORGE'S CHAPEL, WINDSOR: GATHERING ON ST. GEORGE'S DAY

A series of five weekly lectures will be given at St. Mary Aldermary on May 27, June 3, 10, 17, and 24. The lectures begin at 6 p.m., and questions are invited at the end. The subjects and lecturers, in order of date, are: The Rev. W. E. Lees, 'The Use of the Organ in Church'; Mr. Martin Shaw, 'How a Song is Composed' (singer, Mr. George Parker); Mr. Harvey Grace, 'Some Forerunners and Contemporaries of Bach'; The Rev. C. E. Douglas, 'The Right Music for the Mass'; The Rev. E. A. White, 'The First English Hymn-book.'

In response to an invitation from the Dean, the Barclay's Bank Male-Voice Choir of eighty voices sang Evensong in St. Alban's Cathedral on May 11, in place of the Cathedral choir. The music included Charles Wood's setting of the Canticles for three parts, unaccompanied, and Franck's Psalm cl. (adapted). The pointing of the 'English Psalter' was used. Mr. H. W. Pierce conducted, and Mr. W. L. Luttman was at the organ.

As there seems to be some misapprehension as to which of Bach's Chorale Preludes on 'Nun komm' der Heiden Heiland' is set for the forthcoming Associate Examination, we draw readers' attention to the official paragraph in the R.C.O. notices on p. 535.

Nearly seventy Church choirs were represented at a Choir Convention held in Derby Cathedral on April 25. Each choir was accompanied by its vicar and organist. Dr. Sydney Nicholson gave an address, and afterwards conducted a combined practice of chanting. At the close of the Convention, many of the choirs signed forms of affiliation to the School of English Church Music.

We hear with interest of the announcement that a College of Sacred Music is being founded at Providence, Rhode Island, U.S.A. The institution appears to be liberally endowed, and is therefore able to be somewhat more ambitious in scope than the English School of Church Music, to which it is in most respects analogous. We hope to be able to give shortly full particulars of a most promising and interesting enterprise.

A selection from Handel's 'Solomon' was sung by the Coltishall and Horstead Musical Society in Horstead Church on April 17, conducted by the Rev. V. N. Gilbert. Mr. Perry was at the organ, and the soloists were Miss A. Callis, Miss B. Southall, and Mr. George Skingley.

Mr. H. V. Spanner will give his usual half-yearly recital of R.C.O. test-pieces at 3 o'clock on June 12, at the National Institute for the Blind, Great Portland Street. As our readers know, the organ at the Institute is a replica of that at the R.C.O. A recital of test-pieces on such an instrument is of special interest and value to intending candidates.

The Rector and Churchwardens of St. Lawrence Jewry announce their acceptance of the tender of Messrs. Norman & Beard for the rebuilding of the organ. The weekly recitals will therefore cease at the end of May. It is hoped to re-commence them with the renovated instrument in October.

The Wellingborough Choral Society at its twentieth annual concert, on April 18, sang 'Judas Maccabæus' at All Saints' Church. Mr. W. Morris conducted, and Mr. C. J. Wood was at the organ.

The organ at St. John's Parish Church, Hampstead, is to be modernised and electrified by Messrs. Willis. There will be an up-to-date console with adjustable pistons.

The organ at St. Leonard's Parish Church, Bridgnorth, has been reconstructed by Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper, and is now a three-manual of thirty-seven speaking stops and twenty-three pistons.

RECITALS

Mr. Frank Woodhouse, Whitworth Hall, Manchester—Toccata in F, Bach; 'Pilgrim's Progress' (Parts 1 and 2), Austin; Poem, Julius Harrison; Sonata, Reubke.

Mr. Clifford Smith, St. Stephen's Walbrook, E.C.—Prelude and Fugue in E minor and Prelude in A minor, Bach; Introduction and Fugue, Reubke; Choral No. 1, Franck.

Mr. Allanson G. Y. Brown, St. Oswald's, West Hartlepool—Toccata-Prelude on 'Pange Lingua,' Bairstow; Pastorale, Franck; Marche Héroïque, Saint-Saëns; Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, Bach.

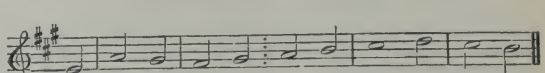
Letters to the Editor

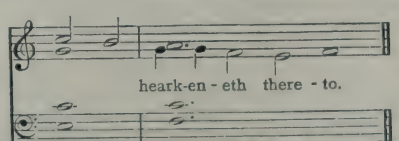
THE MUSICAL RENDERING OF THE PSALMS

SIR,—The article by the Rev. Prof. G. C. Richards in your April number, while interesting and original in its arguments, is disappointing in its conclusions, for how can we eliminate quantity from our speech, or from our singing? It is as essential as accent, and both give life and variety. The Canon suggests a triple chant as capable of providing music 'which should do no violence to the natural spoken rendering.' But words can no more be fitted—with due consideration of their accent and their quantity—into triple time than into duple. There is nothing wrong with most of our chants; the desideratum is to get hold of a Psalter which, with care and commonsense, will make speech-rhythm possible. It is obvious that both duple and triple times must be catered for, but some awkwardnesses are unavoidable—or at least need special treatment, as, e.g., such short verses as Psalm 18, v. 44: 'A people whom I have not known: shall serve me.' There are four ways of treating this verse:

1. To sing four chords to the word 'serve,' which is inconsistent with speech-rhythm.
2. To omit a sufficient number of chords to meet the case. This method often works admirably, but needs careful arrangement.
3. It may be joined up with v. 45, as is done in the 'English Psalter.'
4. This particular verse works well with one syllable to each chord, and two to the last:



If the principle be followed of the synchronisation of final verbal and final musical accents, several syllables will often come on the last chord; sometimes five and occasionally even six (vide 'E.P.' Psalm 10, v. 6, 'happen unto me'; v. 19, 'hearkeneth thereto'; v. 20, 'ex' alted against them'; Psalm 67, v. 1, 'merciful unto us,' &c.). The awkward effect of this is much mitigated by the introduction of a suspension in one or more parts; and where there are four or more syllables, an ornamental suspension is useful:



(I must not be understood to approve of all these multi-syllabic endings—e.g., Psalm 10, v. 20, is probably as good, if not better, with the last bar-line thus: 'a' gainst them.')

Sometimes the uniting of two verses into one gets over the difficulty, and a good instance of this is vv. 14 and 15 of Te Deum. But the joining of

vv. 5 and 6 in the same Canticle spoils it for a double chant; which, however, is quite another matter.

Attempts are made, both in the 'English Psalter' (published by Novello), and in the 'Psalter Newly Pointed' (published by the S.P.C.K.), to meet these various difficulties; and anyone needing a new Psalter should certainly consult both of these before deciding. The former may be called the 'whole-hogger,' having often as many as four or five syllables in a bar; and the latter may be called the 'via media,' being a compromise between the 'Cathedral' and the 'English' Psalters.

Except for the free use of triple time, and the many subtle syllabic accommodations thereby made possible (and which some of us have been using for many years), there is no great cleavage of principle between the 'E.P.' and the 'P.N.P.' Hence this latter will be more easily approached than the 'E.P.'; but when choirs have become accustomed to this step onwards, it is quite possible that they will be ready to go the 'whole hog,' and adopt the 'English Psalter.'—Yours, &c.,

FREDERIC LEEDS.

'VOICE AND VERSE'

SIR,—I have not yet had the opportunity of reading Mr. Colles's book 'Voice and Verse,' reviewed in the April Musical Times, but judging by the main argument of 'Feste's' extract, I think I may be right in fancying the reviewer has misunderstood the author's idea. For a good many years I have based my teaching of the pianoforte on the fact that 'song is the very foundation of all music,' and I venture to quote from two articles on the teacher's point of view of this subject which I had published in Musical Herald, July and August, 1920. The statement does not imply that all instrumental music is limited to the actual compass and idiom of the human voice—such an idea would be manifestly absurd. The thought suggested surely is, that as the new-born baby expresses his feelings untaught, by using his voice, Nature's own universally-bestowed instrument of music, so the grown man will be able to express more intimate and subtle emotions than words can convey by the infinitely varied tones of his voice. Then:

> '. . . as singing is the highest and truest, because most spontaneous and direct, form of music, so must pianoforte playing be brought as nearly as may be into line with singing. . . . The singer simply expresses himself naturally, not stopping to think how [the strained attitude of mind of the over-trained or partially-trained student of singing is, of course, not to be considered here]. If we are amused we laugh; if tired or sad, we sigh; if moved by joy or gratitude, we exclaim in tones readily showing these feelings, even though we may speak in a foreign tongue. How do we do this? We never stop to think—we express ourselves. If every child pianist were taught from his earliest days of music to laugh, to sing, to sigh, even to be cross, into his small tunes, men's ears and hearts would be more often delighted by true spontaneous music on the pianoforte.'

As this is true of the playing, so is it of the writing of instrumental music. The composer first conceives his work as the expression of his own intimate musical feeling—it comes first from himself, and if he had never heard of a musical instrument he would still have the inspiration. He must naturally give it to the world in a fitting form for whatever mode of expression he may choose, so he translates it into terms of the pianoforte, orchestra, organ, or what you will. The germ of the idea was no less vocal because, while it started life, maybe, as a group of plain crotchets, it ended as a series of elaborate demisemiquaver arpeggios. Such a passage as that quoted in your review (Ex. 1) has only to be reduced to solid harmonies to reveal immediately a melodic outline, and if this test be applied to other most unpromising instrumental idioms, 'tunes' will nearly always be found lurking in the background.

To say that Chopin's music, for instance, is not song-like is far from true. Certainly Chopin did not choose the voice as his medium of expression, perhaps because his voice was not a match for his beautiful inspirations. But one has only to look for the lovely threads of melody around which he has woven the embroidery of pianistic adornment to realise that even Scherzos, Polonaises, and other of his works which at first sight seem anything but vocal, are really all founded on song—using the term to mean the expression of the most intimate self in music.

The same applies to all inspired works of all composers for all instruments—the meaning of many a complicated passage of pianoforte music can easily be found if the melodic outline be traced through the harmonies and sung:

> 'The pianoforte sings with many voices . . . even in the simplest of small pieces—a little lyric of Grieg's, a child's first tune of a few bars—there are singing at least two distinct voices. With this idea in the mind make pupils sing as they play, each part in turn. So instinctive a thing is vocal expression that the melodic purport of a passage is often made instantly clear if one sings it, letting the voice make its own nuances.'

The fact of the popularity of the vocal concert numbers as compared with instrumental, is, I maintain, a proof of the truth, not the falseness, of Mr. Colles's theory:

> 'The failure to find the way of communication between feeling and expression is surely responsible for the unpopularity of the pianoforte solos as compared with the songs on a concert programme. The average pianist does not even seem to speak directly to his hearers, but addresses himself to his instrument, which thus stands between him and the audience, and is as a third person spoiling their intercourse. . . . [To remedy this] the pianist must sing from his heart with his pianoforte's voice.'

The analogy bears detailed working out, and phrasing, rhythm, touch in all its gradations of light and shade and tone-colour, gain daily in truth and beauty by the constant striving after this ideal. Thus I venture to think the pianoforte teacher's theory meets the composer's theory as described by Mr. Colles: All music must go 'back to the land' of natural unstudied song for its reality.—Yours, &c.,

ENID MORRIS.

[' Feste ' writes: 'I don't think I misunderstood Mr. Colles's idea. (After all, I have read the book, and Miss Morris hasn't!) Some justification for my point of view is seen in Miss Morris's remark as to vocal concerts being more popular than instrumental concerts. But what of the standard of music in the two programmes? In the great majority of cases the vocal will be many grades below the instrumental. The popularity of bad operas, songs, and singing has been so great a drag on musical progress that many of us are justified in objecting to the undue glorification of the vocal side of music. Incidentally, I may add that at least two other critics—Dr. Ernest Walker and Mr. Eric Blom—have taken a line similar to mine in reviewing Mr. Colles's book.]

SINGERS' ARTICULATION

SIR,—The power of expression through the medium of language (either in the spoken word or in song) belongs to the human voice alone. Even the orchestra, with all its mighty and varied possibilities, cannot emulate this glorious inheritance. And what does the average singer do with this power? Not twenty per cent. of singers (B.B.C. or otherwise—humorists are honourable exceptions) get their words through to the listener. Not, perhaps, five per cent. out of that twenty per cent. express the beauty and significance of the words even if they are clearly uttered. The great majority of the public have, in consequence, long since ceased to regard the text of vocal music as of any importance. And the singing in many foreign languages which few understand well enough to enjoy

(even if they understand at all) has intensified that belief; though clear and expressive English diction easily excites interest in all classes of listeners. In many operatic items or songs in which the words are platitudes, banalities, or even drivel, their loss may be of little or no importance. It might even be that in many cases the 'wordless' song would prove an improvement on the originals. But in lyrics of merit the lack of clear pronunciation and verbal significance gives the listener only half—often not half—of the beauty of the song or other vocal music. Pure, varied vowels and well-shaped consonants obviously form the essential factors of clear articulation, especially (in the case of consonants) those occurring at the beginning and ending of each word, the latter being generally ignored. The power to present the true significance of the words (apart from mere clear articulation) may be more of a psychological than physical problem; it emanates from the temperament and individuality of the singer. That, perhaps, is another story. The average listener would be content with good, distinct English.

In ninety per cent. of the alleged 'singers' who 'mumble or mutter and bore,' or who give us 'gibberish' instead of our noble English language, the fault must be attributed to the teacher.—Yours, &c.,

434, Seven Sisters Road, N.4. MUNRO DAVISON.

LISZT

SIR,—Although a further article on Liszt by Mr. A. Brent-Smith is promised, in his article in the May issue there are statements which call for reconsideration. On p. 402 he says, 'Even when he [Liszt] fully embraced the religious life . . . he was privileged to enjoy all that the world had to offer—success, wealth, and marriage. . . . His renunciation of the world (even in a greatly modified form) at the ripe age of sixty-eight . . . .,' &c. Surely there is a contradiction here. If Liszt 'fully embraced the religious life,' as an Abbé, there could be no 'renunciation of the world even in a greatly modified form.' Liszt did enjoy success in his early days, but he was not wealthy. His last public recital on his own account was given in September, 1847, when he was thirty-six years of age. Thereafter he played only for charity, or to raise funds for some endowment. In his later years his sole source of income was his salary as President of the National Academy of Music at Pest. When he died, at Bayreuth, in 1886, the state of his wardrobe was pitiable.

He was not married. The preparations for his marriage to the Princess Carolyne Sayn-Wittgenstein, fixed for October 22, 1861, Liszt's fiftieth birthday, were vetoed by the Vatican late in the evening of the 21st, the grounds being that the Princess, being a divorced woman, could not re-marry. Liszt's character was not in question.

The 'ripe age of sixty-eight' is inexact, and is possibly due to the mistake in the second and third editions of 'Grove,' by which two separate and distinct ceremonies are made to occur simultaneously. Liszt was admitted to Minor Orders (Abbé) at the age of fifty-four, on April 25, 1865. In this status his vows were not irrevocable; he could marry, but under certain conditions. His letters, however, show that there was a linguistic difficulty, his ignorance of Latin, which at that time stood in the way of a higher step. Fourteen years later, on September 30, 1879, at the age of sixty-eight, his friend, Cardinal Hohenlohe, raised him to the rank of Canon, a rank which entitled him to wear the purple, a distinction never assumed in public. He was porporato only when photographed.

In any study of Liszt's 'religiosity,' to which your contributor alludes, the baneful influence of the Princess must not be lost sight of. His patient and indulgent attitude towards her dogmatism is reflected in the hundreds of letters that he wrote to her when she settled at Rome, in 1860. I have dealt with this elsewhere.—Yours, &c., WILLIAM WALLACE.

FAUX-BOURDON AND DOUBLE-COUNTERPOINT

SIR,—Dr. Arthur T. Froggatt's observation concerning the comparison I made between Stimmtausch and double-counterpoint (Musical Times, April, 1929) is perfectly justified. Double-counterpoint can, indeed, only exist in case of inversion. It is to be remarked, however, that the two voices of the Worcester Troped Sanctus would give, by interchange, a very good-sounding double-counterpoint, if placed at a distance of two octaves of each other instead of one. Interchange of voices, principally trebles, but also other voices, occurs frequently, not only in madrigals, but also in motets of the 16th century.—Yours, &c.,

55, rue Stanley, CHARLES VAN DEN BORREN.

EMANCIPATED POETRY

SIR,—I was delighted to read Mr. Blandford's letter in your May issue, and to see that he, like myself, recognises that the problem of modern music cannot be separated from the problem of all that is modern in the other arts; there has been far too much tendency to discuss a composite art problem from the point of view of music alone. In each of the arts there is undoubtedly a distortion of mental outlook, and in each case a distorted basis has been deliberately manufactured on which to build expressions of that distorted mental outlook.

I prefer this point of view to that of Sir Landon Ronald, who suggests that modern music may be a pose. That would make the movement a voluntary and artificial one; whereas I am inclined to think the movement is the result of the urge of the distorted mental outlook already referred to, and so more or less inevitable.

Mr. Blandford has put forward identical views to those stated above.

These views recognise that a distorted mental artistic outlook may go hand-in-hand with magnificent musical technical equipment; also that artificiality is only in evidence in those cases of a composer 'going modern'—an expression which sufficiently exposes the absurdity of the claim that certain extreme types of modern music are a legitimate step forward in musical evolution.—Yours, &c., HERBERT W. FISHER.

Plymouth.

SIR,—Mr. Blandford needs a course in relativity as well as psycho-pathology. He seems a slave to the 'absolute standard' system of criticism.

All artistic expression is dependent on a technique, and if Mr. Blandford doesn't think it worth the trouble, or is too lazy, to master the technique before he criticises, he would be wiser to imitate the critics he castigates, and allow people to settle questions as to the sanity of James Joyce or 'advanced composers' for themselves.—Yours, &c.,

Holywell Lane, HAROLD BROCKLESBY.
Conisbro, near Rotherham.

[In order to assist such readers as might wish to make a start in mastering the technique of emancipated poetry, we quote the examples that gave rise to Mr. Blandford's letter. Here is Miss Gertrude Stein's effort:

'It is it is it is it is.

'If it and as if it, if it or as if it, if it is as if it, and it is as if it and as if it. Or as if it. More as if it. As more. As more as if it. And if it.

'And for and as if it.

'If it was to be a prize a surprise if it was to be a surprise to realise, if it was to be if it were to be, was it to be. What was it to be. It was to be what it was. And it was. So it was. As it was. As it is. Is it as it as. It is and as it is and as it is.

'And so and so as it was.

'Keep it in sight alright.'

Mr. Ezra Pound's lyric, owing to its highly condensed form, probably calls for an even higher degree of skill:

'PAPYRUS
'Spring . . . .
Too long . . .
Gongula . . .'

We hope no reader will dare to criticise this until he can turn out something at least almost as good.—EDITOR.]

LONG SERVICE

SIR,—I beg leave to add a name to the late Dr. Pearce's 'Organists' Long Service Roll,' viz.: William Piper, who officiated at St. James's, Ludgershall, Wilts, from December 3, 1864, until his death in April, 1915—a full half-century. Archdeacon Carpenter, Precentor of Salisbury, delivered an address at his funeral.

One of my predecessors at St. Mary's, Andover, held the office for over forty years—Thomas Langstaff, ante 1811-1852. He was the Langstaff mentioned in Col. Hawker's Diary, quoted by Mr. Whall in the October number of the Musical Times, p. 931. Col. Hawker lived at Longparish House, four and a half miles distant, and was the owner of a fine Stradivarius violin upon which Mr. Langstaff played. He held music meetings at his house, and in the Hampshire Chronicle of January 6, 1817, it is recorded that 'Mr. Kalkbrenner . . . has been on a visit . . . to Major Hawker, of Longparish House, where several concerts have been held . . . conducted by Mr. Langstaff, of Andover.'

Another member of that musical coterie was Dr. Greenhead, medical attendant to the third Earl of Portsmouth, of Hurstbourne Priors (1767-1853), the father of the talented, but now forgotten, 'Greenhead Family,' or 'Cremona Union Concert Party.'—Yours, &c.,

ARTHUR C. BENNETT.

ORGAN RECITALS AND THE PRESS

SIR,—The following raises, I think you will agree, a much wider question than the particular issues involved. Some time ago, at the Westminster Congregational Church, Buckingham Gate, there was played a movement (the second) from what is considered, I find, to be the most difficult organ composition in existence; indeed, many, on the strength of themselves being unable to play it—such a sound criterion—have declared it, especially the second movement, to be unplayable. Invitations to the number of between twenty and thirty were sent out to the press, but so far not one of those to whom these were sent appears to have made the slightest reference to the event—nor, so far as can be ascertained, were more than one or two present, although the hour was a peculiarly convenient one, between afternoon and evening, when there was nothing to clash.

Is it to be deduced from this that organ recitals are under all and every circumstance, in any place but a concert hall, taboo? Is it not even in the light of a news 'par.' that there is found an organist who tackles a reputedly unplayable work of reputedly wild 'modernity'? Does it not seem gravely unjust that the work of an organist is ignored in this way merely because the locale of his performance does not happen to be within the regular concert 'beat'?

It is now time to specify more closely. The occasion to which I am referring was the performance by Mr. E. Emlyn Davies of the second movement of my Organ Symphony—a performance which is inadequately described by any less adjective than superb, more especially considering the difficulties under which it was achieved—the pressure of other work in a busy musician's life, to say nothing of ill-health—and undertaken, as it was, in a spirit of utterly disinterested enthusiasm that was never once damped by the arduous and laborious nature of the work that had to be put into its preparation. One performance in a year like that of Mr. Emlyn Davies's means more to a composer than one a day of the usual sort, and I take this opportunity of bearing public witness to Mr. Davies's remarkable powers, his brilliant musicianship, his almost clairvoyant insight, his vivid and sympathetic artistic imagination, as a small token of my sense of what is due to him.

Finally, to close on a personal note, I think it will be agreed that the present writer, in view of the tributes that have been paid to his work by some of the finest minds of our time—and the fact that he has been honoured by a request from one of the half-dozen greatest libraries of the world for some of his MSS., has reasonable excuse for thinking his work something more than negligible.—Yours, &c.,

KAIKHOSRU SORABJI.

BRAILLE CENTENARY AND MENDELSSOHN'S 'HYMN OF PRAISE'

SIR,—Referring to the article on p. 413 of your May issue, in which you so kindly commend the great effort which is being made by the National Institute for the Blind to commemorate the hundredth anniversary of the invention of 'Braille,' may I be permitted to say that if any of your readers desire to help, or to obtain any information on the matter, I shall be only too happy to be at their service if they will write to me direct.—Yours, &c.,

EDWARD WATSON

A FRENCH MUSICAL EXHIBITION

SIR,—I am now able to supply further details of the Musical Exhibition at Carpentras (Vaucluse), France, about which you allowed me to make a preliminary announcement in the February issue. The exhibition will be open from Sunday, June 16, to Sunday, June 30, inclusive. I have already given some account of the contents of the exhibition. Concerts will be given as follows: June 16—Popular concert by the Municipal Band; June 18—Chamber music by Frescobaldi, Purcell, Handel, Couperin, Giardini, &c.; June 20 and 22—Orchestral concert, works by Carpentras composers; June 23—Concert of Provençal music (including a Mass by Elzéar Genet, and popular songs) by L'Ecole Provençale d'Apt; June 25—Music by Carpentras composers; June 27—Orchestral concert, modern music; June 30—Sacred concert in the Cathedral, including extracts from the Vespers of Saint-Siffrein. With the exception of the last, all the concerts will be given in the Museum. I hope this information will be useful to any who had thought of attending the exhibition.—Yours, &c.,

J. A. WESTRUP.

CINEMA MUSIC: SARCASM FROM YORKSHIRE

SIR,—In reference to your notes on p. 411 of the May number regarding music in the cinema, and Mr. Casey's remarks, I should like you to know (because apparently you do not, nor do any of my friends who follow music with me) that Mozart's 'Magic Flute' Overture expresses hurry, stress, impending doom, conflicting passions, and, finally, a bridge broken by a thunderbolt and a train falling through it into a ravine. You didn't know that, did you? That is because you just won't be educated by Warner Bros. and their huge staff, whose names take minutes to read, who have made a film with synchronised music and talk called 'Noah's Ark.'

It is no use your saying they are wrong. This film has cost one dollar, or perhaps a million dollars, or perhaps two million dollars, and has taken at least five seconds to think out and some years to make. Therefore it must be right.

There is also an effect of musical colour that you, perhaps, are ignorant of. When an old-time Eastern king condemned a man, he stretched out his arm very pompously, and a trumpet then blared some daft mock-heroic phrase about a quarter of a tone flat (compared with the rest of his orchestra that he always kept playing, morn, noon, and night). That eerie, sardonic, spine-shuddering effect ought to be noted by some old fogies like Stravinsky and Bloch.

As Mr. Casey argues, the cinema certainly reaches the masses. The picture reaches them so well that they don't hear any music, or rather don't really listen to it, and the sooner the cinema ceases its pretence of musical education the better.—Yours, &c., 'TYKE.'

'THE OXFORD HISTORY OF MUSIC'

SIR,—On pp. 413, 414 of your May issue you are kind enough to give a long and detailed review of our new edition of vol. 1 of the 'Oxford History of Music' together with the Introductory volume added to the series. Your reviewer, however, is under a slight misapprehension with regard to the intention of the Oxford University Press as to the re-publication of the other volumes of the 'Oxford History.' A new and revised edition of the complete series is not contemplated.

Vols. 1 and 2 have been revised by Prof. Percy C. Buck, and the Introductory volume added to fill up certain gaps, also under Prof. Buck's direction. The new edition of vol. 2 will appear in the course of a few months. Vols. 3, 4, 5, and 6 will remain as they are without further revision.

Finally, the seventh volume is now being written by Mr. H. C. Colles, and will appear in due course.—Yours, &c.,

HUBERT J. FOSS.

WHAT DID MR. GREWGIOUS HEAR?

SIR,—The real question is, What did Mr. Dickens hear when he gathered the impressions that occupy Mr. Grewgious while waiting for the service to end. As the time was afternoon, we may assume Evensong, more or less choral. The feeble voice was doubtless reading the Lesson, until a vigorous attack on the Magnificat drowned it in a sea of music, or gave that impression. After that another Lesson, or Collects, and more music—and all was still. Mr. Grewgious met the 'living waters' coming out. This must mean the choir—I see no reference to the words of anything sung. The bit of word-painting hangs upon the contrast between the vivid, uplifting effect of the music and the rather sepulchral aspect of the Cathedral in the gathering shadows of late afternoon.

Your correspondent should look over Mr. Lightwood's 'Music of Dickens,' if he has not already done so. I take it that Dickens had an ear for music, and knew what he liked, but had no skill in any department; his musical references are more than likely to be whimsical and humorous. He was not writing a technical report of the service, but throughout the book his references to the 'Cloisterham' choir are not complimentary. Mr. Lightwood gives the opinion of Mr. Luard-Selby that there was no such official as Mr. Jasper is described—a Lay-Precentor or Lay-Clerk who was choirmaster. But I suppose Dickens used the word 'precentor' in a general sense, and there would be nothing impossible about a skilled lay-clerk taking choir practices by arrangement. Writing for immediate publication, Dickens naturally refrained from photographic delineations that might be embarrassing. Much interesting and authentic information about the choir of Rochester Cathedral is found in 'A Westminster Pilgrim,' by Sir Frederick Bridge.—Yours, &c.,

WILLIAM Q. PHILLIPS.

SPARE BOOKS AND MUSIC WANTED

SIR,—Some time ago an appeal was made in the columns of the Spectator inviting readers to send to our village library, denuded by industrial depression, such books as could be spared. The response was splendid, with the result that our stock of books has been increased by over three hundred; but, to the chagrin of music-lovers, there were no music books among them.

Cwmaman is a mining village of eight thousand people, which has been practically paralysed for nearly two years, yet through it all has kept faithful to the highest forms of music—as it has done for the last thirty years.

Its village choir of two hundred voices has never once failed during that period in its performance of oratorio on Christmas Day. Two years ago it was the 'Dream of Gerontius'; four years back, Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion; and last year, 'Israel in Egypt.'

In addition to the village choir we have two operatic societies, two male-voice choirs, and a children's choir.

I quote these facts to show that the interest taken locally in music is real and enthusiastic, and in the hope that some kind readers of the Musical Times may feel inclined to help us. If there are any music books of any kind, theoretical or otherwise, lying idle on any shelves, they will be more than welcomed by this little village community. Any contribution will be gratefully acknowledged by Mr. James Ray, the Librarian, or by—Yours, &c.,

EDWARD LEWIS (Conductor).

Cwmaman, Aberdare.

[We heartily commend this appeal to our readers' generosity.—EDITOR.]

BEETHOVEN AND DAVY

SIR,—In reply to Mr. Britten's letter in your May issue, I think it extremely probable that Beethoven was acquainted with Davy's song 'The Bay of Biscay,' for Davy's songs and incidental music to the plays of his period had an enormous vogue, if we can trust reference books. Moreover, we know that Beethoven took great interest in the wars of his time.

Davy was a contemporary of his, being born at Exeter, December 23, 1763, and dying in extreme poverty in St. Martin's Lane, London, February 22, 1824.—Yours, &c.,

REGINALD SILVER.

Micro Cottage, Colyton, Devon.

We are obliged to hold over, among others, letters from Miss Nancy Gilford (on the appoggiatura in Beethoven's Sonata in D, Op. 10, No. 3), Mr. R. A. J. Jervois (on 'Organ Pedalling'), and Mr. J. D. Tetley (on Prof. Sanford Terry's 'Bach's Chorales').

UNION OF GRADUATES IN MUSIC INCORPORATED

The Council of the Union of Graduates in Music has nominated Prof. E. J. Dent, Professor of Music in the University of Cambridge, to serve as representative of the Union on the Council of the Incorporated Society of Musicians for a period of three years as from January, 1929.

Prof. F. H. Shera, Rossiter Hoyle Professor of Music in the University of Sheffield, has been elected a Vice-President of the Union.

The summer meeting of the Union will take place in connection with the University of Birmingham on July 29, 30, and 31 next. Provisional arrangements are now being made; a programme of events will be issued to all members in due course.

We understand that the Hart House String Quartet is to visit this country in October. The Quartet consists of Geza de Kresz, Harry Adaskin, Milton Blackstone, and Boris Hambourg. Apparently this is the Quartet's first visit to Europe—certainly to England. London has extended a warm welcome during the past few seasons to chamber-music parties from practically every country in Europe. It is to be hoped that these Toronto players will be no less cordially received. They have a large repertory, and U.S.A. and Canadian press critics have praised them highly. Letters and inquiries should be sent to Messrs. Ibbs & Tillett, Wigmore Street, W.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Important events cast their shadows before, and at least two of the happenings of the summer term are well worth recognition. For some time past the press and the public have realised that, thanks in the main to Sir Henry Wood, the Royal Academy orchestra is an institution meriting whole-hearted support. On Tuesday afternoon, June 11, at Queen's Hall, Sir Henry will conduct the orchestra, and one of the features of the programme will be Beethoven's sixth Symphony ('The Pastoral').

The annual operatic week at the Scala Theatre will begin on July 8, ending on Saturday, July 13. The operas chosen for presentation are Puccini's 'La Bohème,' Verdi's 'Rigoletto,' and German's 'Merrie England.' The last-named work is a peculiarly appropriate selection, for Sir Edward German is an old Academy student, having entered in September, 1881.

An item of interest to students, indeed to everybody interested in the study of music, is the announcement that a number of scholarships for various subjects will be offered for competition in September next. The last day of entry is Monday, July 22, and detailed particulars, entry forms, &c., may be had on application to the Secretary of the Royal Academy, York Gate, N.W.1. It is advisable to state the branch of music in which the candidate is interested.

In September there will be held a Vacation Course for Teachers. Lectures will be given during the four days from September 17 to 20 inclusive, on the following subjects:

Pianoforte, by Frederick Moore, each day at 10 a.m.
Class Singing, by Dr. Stanley Marchant, each day at 12 noon.
Aural Training, by Ernest Read, each day at 2 p.m.
Musical History and Appreciation, by Stewart Macpherson, each day at 4 p.m.

The Academy has suffered a severe loss by the death of Sir Anthony Bowlby, who was one of the Directors, and who took a keen interest in the welfare and working of the institution.

Mr. W. Chalmers Burns, of the Royal Academy, has been awarded the Bernard Hale Organ Scholarship at Peterhouse, Cambridge.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC

Sir Hugh Allen, in his customary address to the students at the opening of the term, proved once more that even after some thirty or more of similar occasions, it is still possible for an inventive and ingenious mind to devise something new wherewith to adorn his tale and point a subtle but effective moral. Ringing the changes on the labours of pleasure and the pleasures of labour, Sir Hugh left us to decide for ourselves as to which is the more exacting and tiresome, work or play, illustrating the discussion with examples from this mercilessly mechanised existence of ours.

Referring to the thin line that divides work from play Sir Hugh said: 'Some find work a pleasure, some find pleasure a labour; some find both equally enjoyable, some both equally a strain. After the exacting labours of our everyday employment as the terms follow each other, the peacefulness of the vacation is heaven. But our views of heaven are considerably varied; so much so that, as one man's meat is another man's poison, so is one man's heaven of a very different atmosphere and temperature from another's.' And again: 'Strenuousness is not only the characteristic of the work side of life, although it demands it more and more, but it has become as much a quality of what we call our relaxations. Naturally the rebound is the greatest when the pressure has been the most severe, but one would have thought that the more exciting and busy and violent and exhausting the work side of our life is, the more we should take our relaxation in an easy, languorous, contemplative, lie-a-bed, slow-motion-picture form of occupation. Not a bit of it! The real business of life comes out in us when we start on having a holiday. You know that when you want to get into lower gear you have to accelerate, and then you begin to grind. As soon as we are free of the fetters which bind us to our work we want to go the furthest, the fastest, the highest; we never want to stop, but desire and almost achieve the solution of the problem of perpetual motion. An arterial road alone meets our desire—an open throttle, a speedometer thrown into convulsions, a fainting policeman, and the eventual contemplation of a magistrate from a too close-up point of view, and a licence endorsed or a prison cell.

'That is life at its best, exhilarating, slightly dangerous, wholly indefensible, but very attractive. Then the joy of the roads at Easter; the gentle stream of traffic, the kindly face of the driver of each advancing car, the grim but fraternal glance of the overtaking party (those mosquitos of the road and ground game), the gentle, apologetic, self-effacing attitude of the pedestrian who, glorying in the monopoly of the pavement, seeks from time to time to join his friends above by a too-confident belief in his stability and invulnerability, and so, in crossing the road, crosses the river instead.'

The following awards have been made: Charlotte Holmes Exhibition—divided between Susan Jones ('cello) and Violet P. Brough (violin). Council Exhibitions—Patience Henn-Collins ('cello), Peggy Henrici (hautboy), Myrtle Bowyer (pianoforte), Alison L. Smalley (violin), Elsie Curry ('cello), Cynthia Perrins (singing), Joan Hordern (singing), Ruth M. King (violin), Jane M. A. Cazenove (pianoforte), John J. Bunney (violin), Florence Gurnell ('cello), Eileen M. Cashman (pianoforte accompaniment), Ruth Pasco (pianoforte), Agnes Brownlow (singing); Extra Awards—Elizabeth M. Smith (violin), Juanita Triggs (pianoforte), Thyra Christiansen (pianoforte), Eleanor M. Tiley (singing), Elma M. Haddow (singing). Raymond ffennell Prizes for Teachers' Training Course—Vera Barker (pianoforte), Katherine Brown (violin), Mary Carey (pianoforte), Betty S. Clappen (pianoforte), Bernard Collier (pianoforte), Cecilia Creasey (pianoforte), Winifreda Dinn (aural), Alan S. Harrison (pianoforte), Helen Hilton (pianoforte), Kathleen Just (pianoforte), Ernestine Kimber (pianoforte), Ruth M. King (violin), Reginald Morley (violin), Edith Papworth (pianoforte), Marjorie Parker (pianoforte), Mary Pelloe (pianoforte), Kathleen Porteous (pianoforte), Helen Scott (pianoforte).

LONDON CENTRE

The annual prize distribution, on April 27, was very largely attended. The chair was taken by Dr. John Warriner. He extended a cordial welcome to Sir Frederic Cowen, who attended to distribute the awards gained in 1928. In his introductory remarks he said that Sir Frederic had never written an ugly bar of music in his life, and that no superfluous sharps or flats, or unnatural naturals, ever marred his compositions.

The secretary of the London centre (Mr. T. Lester Jones), in presenting the annual report, stated that though the past year was not a record one, upwards of twelve hundred students of varying ages were examined in the respective divisions at this centre alone, without taking into account the large number who entered for the higher examinations, diplomas, and scholarships.

Sir Frederic Cowen spoke encouragingly to those on the threshold of musical life. One of his most treasured memories was that, at the advanced age of eight years, he wrote a simple march and gave it the title 'Garibaldi.' To his great delight the Italian patriot in whose honour it was dedicated consented to accept a copy. He concluded by reminding students that nothing that was worth having was gained without persistent effort.

Mr. Stanley Roper, the new Principal, in a breezy address referred to the many signs of musical awakening in this country.

The following Exhibitions were awarded: Joan Prime (Clerkenwell), intermediate pianoforte; René Keysell (Fulham), senior violin; Lillian M. Yapp, H.H. Princess Helena Victoria's Exhibition for pianoforte playing, junior division.

Musical items were contributed by Mr. Clarence Matthews, Miss Thelma Nurick, Miss René Keysell, Miss Lillian M. Yapp, Miss Constance Fecher, Miss Mary E. Shaw, and Miss Sophie M. Brunner.

The summer term began on April 29, and the number of new students is very gratifying.

Mr. E. Stanley Roper has now assumed the duties of Principal.

The College gave an 'At Home' to meet the new Principal and Mrs. Roper on May 16. Members of the teaching staff and others were present.

On May 8, Dr. John E. Borland gave an interesting lecture to students, his subject being 'Preludes and Overtures.'

Successful distributions have been held at Stroud, Hastings, Plymouth, Woolwich, Chester, and Cardiff, at which the Controller of Examinations, Mr. d'Evry, represented the College.

Demonstration concerts from the College syllabus were given at Stroud and Chester by Miss C. O'Brien, and at Cardiff by Miss Maud A. Winter. The Principal attended a distribution at Grimsby.

The death of Mr. A. L. Arnold, local secretary of the Scarborough centre, is recorded with regret.

The College Orchestra, under Mr. J. Ivimey, performed a programme of music (as usual) at the Presentation Day ceremony of the London University in the Albert Hall. An appreciative letter of thanks for their services has been received from the Vice-Chancellor.

The diplomas recently gained will be presented at Queen's Hall on June 29.

Young gentleman, keen on pianoforte study, wishes to meet others similarly interested. S.E. district.—X. Y. Z., c/o Musical Times.

Sharps and Flats

Covent Garden remains Covent Garden. . . . . Emeralds, diamonds, rubies, and pearls seems to be the sequence taken by the jewels worn this year at the opera. Bracelets are more prevalent than ever; tiaras are hardly seen at all.—Jacqueline Howard.

Dinner clothes at the opera are just as much out of place as spats with flannels, a coloured waistcoat, or a black tie with an evening-tailed coat. There are dozens of other sartorial errors I could quote. . . .—Fonthill Beckford.

Three-four time is simply cripple time.—Junior Examination Paper.

Contralto is a low sort of music that only ladies sing.—Ibid.

'La Fille aux Cheveux de Tin . . .' (Debussy).—Concert Programme.

Saxophone and Trumpet Player could conduct or teach dance or brass bands; good engineering experience.—Advt. in East Anglian paper.

Parry's music, with the possible exception of a few quite pleasant but in no way remarkable songs, is completely negligible.—Cecil Gray.

Competition Festival Record

BIRMINGHAM (April 29-May 4).—Ninet-nine competitions were distributed as follows: Pianoforte, eighteen; strings, eight; vocal solo, six; choirs, twenty-five; drama and elocution, seventeen; national dances, twenty-five. Epidemics had been at work in the schools, which are the chief preparing-grounds of competitions for this Festival, but the number of entries was nevertheless six hundred—a good total, if not a record. Neither the dramatic classes nor the folk-dancing seemed to suffer diminution, and these were among the strongest features of the Festival. In the chief adult competitions it was remarkable that a few visiting choirs from the Lancashire district took all the prizes. Mr. Alfred Higson's choir from Sale was first in the mixed-voice and female-voice classes, and the second place in each case was taken by Mr. Aldous's choir from Lancaster. Mrs. Bourne's Barrow Choir was first in the male-voice section. Bournville Musical Society came to the front only in the competition for working-men's choirs. One of the most pleasing performances of the Festival was that of Mr. Cyril Johnson's Juvenile Orchestra in 'The Seasons,' a Suite by J. C. Ames.

BUXTON (April 8-11).—Here were eighty classes, three thousand competitors, and four halls in occupation. All elementary school-children were admitted free, and those who came from a distance were given free teas and a third of their fares. This meant six hundred teas. Some of the choral test-pieces proved a deterrent. No choirs at first were attracted by

'Sing ye to the Lord,' for which a Weelkes Ballet and a Tallis Anthem were substituted, bringing in seven choirs. Only one choir had the courage to sing Patrick Hadley's difficult 'Faerie Song,' a setting of Yeats; this was the Matlock Ladies' Choir, conducted by Mr. L. G. Wildgoose. In the male-voice class Chesterfield was first and Gorton second by a mark. In the mixed-voice class, Reddish C.W.S. was first and Salford Vocal Society second.

CHEPSTOW.—The newly-formed Monmouthshire Rural Community Council held its first Festival on April 12 and 13, when a series of competitions for school and village choirs, pianoforte playing, and melody writing took place. Money prizes were excluded, graded certificates being awarded to the winners.

CHIPPENHAM (April 27-May 1, May 4).—This was the first visit of the Wiltshire Festival to Chippenham, which provided four competition rooms and a good concert hall. Twenty-five school choirs came in on the opening Saturday, and many more on the following Monday. It was noticeable that although children's choirs came in from small and distant villages, those of Chippenham itself held aloof. A band of boy violinists from Swindon Sanford Street Elementary School, conducted by Mr. H. Painter, again won the challenge cup which they have held unopposed since 1923. Numerically the best of the adult choral classes was that for Women's Institutes, with seventeen choirs taking part; but the adjudicator found that the quality of the singing was not good. The choir from Aldbourne (Miss Stroud) was the best. Among the choirs from large villages, Minety Church Choral Society (Mr. S. W. Underwood) won the chief success. Warminster St. John (Mr. J. W. Carr) was first of the town choral societies. In the male-voice class a tie occurred between Wyndham and Wilton Choral Societies. Swindon College Ladies' Choir (Mr. H. S. Fairclough) was at the head of its class.

CHIPPING NORTON (April 16-18).—The twenty-first Festival of the Stour Choral Union brought many town and village choirs together in spite of prevailing illness that took toll of the lists. There was no choir from Cherington, a village that has rarely failed since the Festival started. A new class for Women's Institutes brought only three entries as a beginning, but it is known from experience elsewhere that this is a field that quickly grows. The choirs were separated into divisions that each had its day of competing and its evening concert. The senior choirs competed in Byrd's 'While the bright sun,' Brahms's 'The Bridegroom' (female voices), Dunhill's 'Full fathom five' (male voices), the final chorus from 'Semele,' and sight-reading. Each test brought its separate award; the challenge banner for the highest aggregate went to Chipping Norton choir, conducted by Mr. A. W. Kemp. At the final concert massed choirs were joined by the Leamington Orchestral Society.

CROYDON (April 29-May 4).—This was the seventeenth Festival. It was not as big numerically as last year's, but for a hundred and ten classes to receive 1,830 entries shows a flourishing state of affairs. Solo work remains the predominating influence. Although the test-pieces were exacting, the entries were numerous, some competitors coming from a distance, and on the whole the performers were level with their task. Three prizes—the chief award for women's solo-singing and two junior awards for pianoforte-playing—were won by girls from the Royal Normal College for the Blind. The chief prizes for choral singing were won by Croydon Choral Society, Wimbledon Central Boys' School, Talfourd College (Peckham), and Addiscombe District Girl Guides.

DORKING (April 9-12).—The Leith Hill district was, as usual, keen in support of its twentieth Festival. Eight choirs entered in each of the divisions of village choirs, the successful ones, on an aggregate of several competitions, being Betchworth (Mrs. G. L. W. Rickett) and Brockham (Mr. C. Knight). The competing town choirs were Dorking Madrigal Society (Mr. H. Wardale), Dorking Oriana (Miss M. Rate), Epsom Choral Society (Mr. R. Milford), Leatherhead Choral Society (Miss M. Cullen), and Leatherhead Orpheus (Mr. H. G. Kimberley). The banner for the highest aggregate, which the two Dorking choirs held jointly for the year, was won by Dorking Madrigal. At the final concert, Parts 1 and 2 of 'The Creation' were performed under Dr. Vaughan Williams.

DOUGLAS (April 15-18).—This was the thirty-eighth Manx Festival, both a sign and a cause of the musical gifts of the islanders, who, as is well known, frequently invade the mainland and carry off important prizes. It was remarked during the Festival that the 'Dawnay' Shield, offered for the last five years at the London Festival, had been brought four times to the Isle of Man. The choir which last performed this feat, Mrs. W. Black's 'Cushag' choir of ladies from Ramsey, was nevertheless beaten by two other choirs at Douglas, Mr. A. P. Hunt's Castletown choir being second and Mr. Noah Moore's Manx Ladies' Choir first. Mr. Moore's Douglas Male Choristers and Mr. T. C. Borris's Rushen Choral Society were also first-prize winners. An excellent children's day was arranged with the co-operation of the Isle of Man Teachers' Association.

ILKLEY (April 8-11).—The twenty-third Wharfedale Festival displayed many features of interest besides the fact that it was more flourishing than ever. The only set-backs to its success were the number of withdrawals (due to epidemics) and the fact that chamber music remains undeveloped. Among the best classes were those for choir-boys and for Girls' Secondary Schools, of which the Bingley Girls' Grammar School and St. Joseph's School, Bradford, were particularly good. Two candidates for the aural test, a girl and a boy, obtained full marks. A prize was won by a children's choir of five voices. There were forty-five folk-dance teams, one of which (and a prize-winner, too) was accompanied by mouth-organs. In the adult choral competitions the first prizes were won by Cleckheaton Central Choir, Colne Orpheus Glee Union, and Stockbridge (Sheffield) St. Cecilia Choir.

LEWES (April 24-26).—The choral Festival organized by the East Sussex Federation of Women's Institutes is now an important meeting of choirs of all kinds—mixed, male, female, church, and children's. In all, nearly seventy choirs entered. At the end there was a memorable performance of Bach's 'Sleepers, wake,' by the massed choirs of five hundred singers, under the direction of Mr. Armstrong Gibbs. The solo parts were sung by Miss Dorothy Silk and Mr. Keith Falkner.

LIVERPOOL (April 20-26 and May 1).—Forty-four classes brought in, it is said, two thousand entries. Perhaps the most remarkable fact of the competition season is that out of the whole population of Liverpool, not a single school choir entered. Among the solo singers vibrato was found to be more intense than at other centres. The Festival opened with a choral day of seven contests, in which the chief prizes were won by Stretford Ladies' Choir (Mr. A. E. Baker), Metropolitan-Vickers Male-Voice Choir, Manchester (Mr. A. E. Baker), and Linacre Wesleyan Mission (C. K. MacPherson).

MORECAMBE (May 2-4).—Well over three thousand competitors took part in the thirty-third Festival. The chief solo classes brought in competitors by twenties, thirties, or forties; many school choirs came from a distance (Millom, Grange-over-Sands, Blackburn, Bradford); there were fifty teams of folk-dancers; the gathering of choirs was representative of the north—and would have been more so if three famous choirs had not been competing at Birmingham. The chief prizes were won by Halifax Glee and Madrigal Society, Blackpool Glee and Madrigal Society (female voices), and Colne Orpheus Glee Union (male voices). On the Friday evening the choirs in the less advanced competitions, joined by the Blackpool Amateur Orchestra, gave a performance of 'The Messiah' under Mr. Julius Harrison.

NEWCASTLE (May 1-11).—The eleventh North of England Musical Tournament enclosed within itself a four-day folk-dancing Festival, attended by many keen and expert teams of dancers. One team came from the Newcastle School for the Deaf. A unique feature of this Festival is the playing of the Northumbrian pipes, an instrument capable of higher artistic expression than is usually supposed—as the competitors demonstrated. Among the new classes were those for Operatic ensemble and Classical Dancing. Three of the prizes for composition were won by Miss Hilda Milvain. The leading choral successes were won by West Hartlepool L. & N.E.R. Temperance Choir and New Seaham Workmen's Club. At the end of the Festival, Newcastle Symphony Orchestra joined the massed orchestral and choral competitors in a concert.

PEOPLE'S PALACE, E. LONDON (April 30-May 8).—The competitions for adult choral singers, and a few for players of chamber-music, were held on six evenings. In a neighbourhood that suffers as much as any competition area in the kingdom from poverty and ill-health the Festival proceeds year after year with undiminished success, and the standard of the singing gradually improves. Such interpretations as those of Weelkes's 'To shorten winter's sadness' and Byrd's 'Come to me, grief, for ever,' given by the Stepney Orpheus Choir (Rev. C. J. Beresford), would have been a credit to any Festival. This choir and conductor, besides winning in the madrigal class, were also top in the chief mixed-voice, male-voice, and female-voice classes. Other frequent competitors were the various bands of singers, young and old, from St. James's, Ratcliff, who were directed by Mrs. Atherton Knowles; and the name of Day-Winter, long familiar in East-End musical affairs, occurred frequently in the list of conductors—now representing two generations. The best-attended choral competition was that for elementary Girls' and Women's Clubs; five of the twelve choirs were conducted by Mrs. I. D. Richardson, and they won the first three prizes. Other conductors whose names appeared frequently were Mr. E. G. Beck (seven times), Mr. W. E. Pepper (four), and Mr. Cecil Free (four); and there were others whose work for the community—for it is no less—was as devoted and untiring. At the end of the Festival an evening (May 10) was given to rehearsal, and an evening (May 11) to a concert by prize-winning choirs, imported soloists, and the combined choirs under Dr. Malcolm Sargent.

PETERSFIELD (April 15-18).—The four days of this Festival were as usual given to children's choirs, third-, second-, and first-grade adult choirs, each group having its own evening concert. The chief works performed were the chorale, 'Sleepers, wake'; Wood's 'Master Mariners,' with Mr. Keith Falkner as soloist, and Mozart's A major Pianoforte Concerto, played by Dr. Malcolm Sargent; Haydn's 'Spring,' and violin solos played by Mr. Albert Sammons; Dyson's 'In honour of the city' and Rootham's 'Brown Earth.' The Petersfield Festival Orchestra took part in each concert, and Dr. Adrian Boult conducted. The prizes in the three adult groups were won by Chiddingfold (Mr. M. G. Blower), Liss (Miss C. Master), and Sheet (Miss Kathleen Merritt).

WEYMOUTH (April 23).—The preliminary contests of the Dorset Choral Association were held at various centres during March, and the survivors came to Weymouth for final competition. There were seventy choirs and seventeen instrumental combinations, from trios to orchestras. In the principal competitions the prize-winners were: female-voice choirs, Parkstone; male-voice choirs, Wessex Harmonic Choristers; choral societies, Weymouth Singers; large villages, Sturminster Newton; Women's Institutes (with membership of over a hundred), Dorchester; orchestras, Dorset Orchestral Association.

YORK (April 29-May 4).—This Festival has been expanded from three to nine days, with new classes for elocution and new medals and cups offered to village choral societies. The entry list in these sections, and in that for school choirs, was very good. Eleven school choirs from York had sung in one class; but it was remarked by the adjudicator that many of them sang out of tune. As at other Festivals, there was plenty of folk-dancing, but here it was of an unusually high quality. In the chief choral classes Bramley Ladies' Choir and Keighley Vocal Union won the most conspicuous successes. The tests for the many village choirs were of a good standard (for example, Handel's 'Come, let us a-maying go' and Charles Wood's 'Cowslips for her covering' for female-voice choirs), and the singing was on a level with the music.

Between Easter and Whitsun there occurred many other competition Festivals, some of them long-established and flourishing, which we lack the space to report. Among them were: ALDERLEY EDGE (May 9-13); the eighteenth Festival of the Essex Musical Association at CHELMSFORD (April 27 and 29); CHELTENHAM (May 9-11); the Wirrall and Eddisbury Festival at CHESTER, where a hundred folk-dance teams collected (April 24-27); the West Lindsey Festival at GAINSBOROUGH (April 17-19); the Berks, Bucks, and Oxon Festival this year at HIGH WYCOMBE (May 4 and 8-11); the Wensleydale Tournament at LEYBURN (May 1-2); NORWICH (May 8-11); the North Northants Festival at OUNDLE (April 19-20); PORTSMOUTH (May 2-4); SCARBOROUGH (April 25-27); SCUNTHORPE (May 6-11); the Mid-Somerset Festival on its second visit to WESTON-SUPER-MARE (May 9-16); the twenty-second Eskdale Tournament at WHITBY (April 23-26); the Mid and West Hertfordshire Festival at BERKHAMSTED (April 10-13); the Mary Wakefield Westmorland Festival at KENDAL (April 29-May 2).

At the Croydon Festival, candidates from the Normal College for the Blind, Upper Norwood, greatly distinguished themselves. At one of the vocal solo classes (thirty-four entries), Dorothy Allen gained the gold medal; in the junior pianoforte-playing competition (fifty-two entries) the top place was won by Joan Hewlett and the second place by Margaret Brand. Joan Hewlett also gained a gold medal for obtaining the highest marks of any candidate for pianoforte playing.

A new Kent competition Festival is being inaugurated at Bromley, and will take place in November. The syllabus has just been issued, and may be had on application to the secretary, Mr. H. Saunders, 9, Minster Road, Bromley, Kent. The scheme was publicly launched on May 15 at a concert given in Central Hall, Bromley, when a choir about a hundred strong, organized for the occasion, sang Part 1 of 'Gerontius' and miscellaneous items, conducted by Mr. Henslow Orchard. There was a large orchestra, including some members of the L.S.O., and the soloists were Mr. Steuart Wilson and Mr. Stephen Jasper. Although the choir was of a 'scratch' character, and had been able to rehearse but little, the singing in 'Gerontius' reached a standard that promises well so far as the choral side of the Festival is concerned.

SCOTLAND

ABERDEENSHIRE.—The sixteenth Aberdeen and North-East of Scotland Festival ran for four days at Aberdeen. This, although the oldest Festival in Scotland, has latterly been overshadowed by others of later date, but during the last year or two has shown a revival of interest among both competitors and the general public. The outstanding feature of this year's competitions was the excellence of the instrumental work. Principal awards: Mixed Choirs, Ferryhill Choir, Aberdeen; Men's Choirs, Railway Male-Voice Choir, Aberdeen; Women's Choirs, Banff Ladies' Choir; W.R.I. Choirs, Alford; School Choirs, Queen's Cross Secondary School, Aberdeen, and Aberdeen Junior High School; Scottish Country Dancing, Girls' High School, Aberdeen, Balmoral Rangers, and St. Catherine's Club, Aberdeen; Vocal Solos (Scottish), Miss Nan M. Taylor, Buckie; Violin Solos, Miss Maisie Burnett, Aberdeen; Pianoforte Solos, Miss Elsie Paterson, Aberdeen.

AYRSHIRE.—The thirteenth Ayrshire Festival, held alternately at Ayr and Kilmarnock, took place this year at Ayr, and occupied four days. Principal awards: Mixed Choirs, Kilmarnock Lyric Choir; Men's Choirs, Kilmarnock Lyric Choir; Women's Choirs, The Wycherley Choir, Glasgow; Church Choirs, Portland U.F. Church, Troon; School Choirs, Ayr Academy, and Kilmarnock Academy; Junior Choirs, Trinity Church, Galston; Scottish Country Dancing, Ayr Grammar School; Violin Solos, John Armour, Kilmarnock; Pianoforte Solos, Ellen Thomson, Barleith; 'Cello Solos, Elizabeth Danks, Ayr.

BORDER COUNTIES.—The tenth Border Counties Festival ran for six days, three at Hawick and three at Galashiels. Principal awards: Mixed Choirs, Carr's Works, Carlisle; Men's Choirs, London Road Male-Voice Choir, Carlisle; Women's Choirs, Duns Choral Society; Church Choirs, Wilton Parish Church, Hawick; School Choirs, Kelso High School; Junior Choirs, Kelso High School; String Orchestras, Miss M'Cubbin's String Orchestra, Galashiels; Scottish Country Dancing, Burgh Public School, Galashiels, and Langshaw W.R.I.; Vocal Solos, Miss Betty Litster, Galashiels, and William West, Peebles; Pianoforte Solos, Miss Dacie Crosbie, Melrose; Violin Solos, Miss Mary Henderson, Hawick.

BUTE.—The fifth Bute and District Festival was held at Rothesay, Isle of Bute, and occupied four days. Entries showed a falling-off on previous years. Principal awards: Mixed Choirs, Cumbrae Mixed-Voice Choir, Millport; School Choirs, Rothesay Academy; Vocal Solos, Alex. Plumpton, Rothesay.

DUMFRIESSHIRE.—The eighth Dumfriesshire Festival ran for three days at Dumfries. Principal awards: Mixed, Men's, and Women's Choirs, Kirkcudbright Choral Society; School Choirs, Noblehill School and Annan Academy; Scottish Country Dancing, Dalton, Carronbridge, Gretna W.R.I., Annan Academy, and Lockerbie Academy; Pianoforte Solos, Miss Elizabeth Sloan, Dumfries; Violin Solos, A. W. Locke, Castle Douglas.

DUNDEE.—The eighth Dundee Festival encouraged the belief that this Festival, which a year or two ago was on the verge of collapse, has now found its feet. Principal awards: Mixed Choirs, Dundee Gaelic Musical Association; Men's Choirs, Kilsyth Co-operative Society Choir; Women's Choirs, Brechin Girls' Club; Church Choirs, Brechin Parish Church; School Choirs, Morgan Academy, Dundee, Blackness School, Dundee, and Harris Academy, Dundee; Junior Choirs, Girls' Industrial School, Dundee; School String Orchestras, Harris Academy, Dundee; Scottish Country Dancing, Dundee Training College, Grove Academy, Broughty Ferry, and 1st Arbroath Girl Guides; Vocal Solos, C. M. B. Douglas, Newtyle; Violin Solos, N. Leckie, Dundee; 'Cello Solos, J. Crook, Newport.

GLASGOW.—By the elimination of a number of classes from the syllabus, and the segregation of the Elocution and Scottish Country Dance sections, the Music section of the nineteenth Glasgow Festival was carried through in eight days instead of extending, as in the past, over fourteen days. A new feature was the substitution in all classes of an own-choice piece and an imposed piece for two imposed test-pieces, as set hitherto. The result showed a gratifying absence of errors of taste in the choice of test-pieces by the competitors, but a surprisingly prevalent lack of judgment as to what best suited them. A good average standard of performance was maintained, without any remarkable 'high lights.' A close approximation in standard between the A and B classes of vocal solos indicated the desirability of merging the two grades of solo work. The senior instrumental solo work, both pianoforte and string, showed a marked improvement over recent years. Some brilliant performances were given in the premier male-voice choir class on the final evening, making a stirring climax to the Festival. Principal awards: Mixed Choirs, Socialist Choristers, Glasgow, and St. George Co-operative Choir, Glasgow; Men's Choirs, Ulster Choir, Belfast, Clydebank Choir, and Glasgow Philharmonic Choir; Women's Choirs, Mr. Thorpe Davie's Choir, Glasgow, St. George Co-operative Choir, Glasgow, and Barrhead Co-operative Choir; Church Choirs, Sherwood U.F. Church, Paisley, Portland U.F. Church, Troon, and Radnor Park U.F. Church, Glasgow; Junior Choirs, Glasgow Orpheus Juniors, St. George Co-operative Juniors, and Dumbarton Equitable Co-operative Juniors; School Choirs, St. John's Grammar School, Hamilton, Grangemouth High School, and Kent Road School, Glasgow; Action-Songs, Glasgow Orpheus Sangspiel; Scottish Country Dancing, Hillend Team, Greenock, and Shields Road School, Glasgow; Eurhythmic interpretation, St. Kentigern's School, Glasgow; Vocal Solos (General), Alec Christie, Glasgow; (Scots Song), Miss Peggie Dow, Glasgow; (Operatic), Miss Peggie Dow, Glasgow; Lieder Class, Alec Hanna, Dumbarton (bass), and Miss Phœbe Davie, Glasgow (pianoforte); Pianoforte Solos, Jack B. B. Whitfield, Cambuslang, and Miss Mollie Davie, Glasgow; Violin Solos, Miss Dorothy Roy, Dundee, and Alex. G. Rose, Ayr.

MORAYSHIRE.—The seventh Moray Festival, held at Elgin, extended over six days. Entries were well maintained, and the interest of the public as unflagging as ever. Principal awards: Mixed Choirs, Elgin Choral Society; Women's Choirs, New Elgin W.R.I.; School Choirs, Elgin East-End School, and Elgin Academy; Junior Choirs, Forres High U.F. Church Sunday School Choir; Scottish Country Dancing, Millbank School, Nairn, and Elgin Community Drama Society; Vocal Solos (General), Miss Nan M. Taylor, Buckie; (Scots Song), Miss Dora Green, Buckie; Pianoforte Solos, Miss Isabel Buchan, Elgin; Violin Solos, Miss Burnett, Aberdeen.

NORTHERN COUNTIES.—The eighth Northern Counties Festival ran for four days at Inverness. Entries were up in all but the school classes, which were adversely affected by an outbreak of diphtheria. Keen interest was shown by the public. An unusual feature was the appearance in the mixed- and male-voice choir classes of choirs of school pupils from Inverness Royal Academy. A doubtful expedient on the purely vocal side, it can claim, nevertheless, the strong merit of helping to bridge over a difficult gap, and certainly a careful discretion was shown both in the handling of the immature voices and in the choice of suitable music. Some fine singing was heard in the Scots Song solo classes and from the school choirs. Principal awards: Mixed, Men's, and Women's Choirs, Inverness Academy; Church Choirs, U.F. High Church, Inverness; Junior Choirs, Beauly Sunday School Choir; School Choirs, Inverness Academy, Tain Academy, Heatherley School, Inverness, Merkinch School, Beauly School, and Fortrose Academy; Vocal Solos (General), Murdo J. Mackenzie, Beauly; (Scots Song), Miss M. Cameron, Inverness (a blind singer); Jacobite Songs, Miss Nettie Burry, Inverness; Violin Solos, Miss Maisie Petrie, Inverness; Pianoforte Solos, Miss Barbara Main, Burghead; 'Cello Solos, Mrs. A. Cameron, Nairn.

WEST LOTHIAN.—The tenth West Lothian Festival, which is purely choral, ran for three days at Linlithgow, and with three thousand competitors taking part, topped all previous records. Principal awards: Mixed Choirs, Armadale Parish Church Choir; Men's Choirs, Mr. Finlay's Choir, Edinburgh; Women's Choirs, Bathgate Women Choristers; Church Choirs, Craigmailen U.F. Church, Linlithgow; Girl Guide Choirs, 3rd Bo'ness Company; School Choirs, Bo'ness Academy, and Bathgate Academy.

IRELAND

CARRICKFERGUS (April 23-27).—Over four hundred entries, of which nearly a third were for verse-speaking. One choral competition was carried to a high standard by the winning choir, Carrickfergus Choral Society (Mr. J. H. Gleave); the second and only other competing choir was Belfast Choral Union (Mr. J. Graham). The successful male-voice choir was Whiteabbey (Rev. J. M'Kee).

DUBLIN FEIS CEOIL (April 29-May 4).—The nine hundred entries were a slight falling-off from last year. Choral singing was as usual not a strong feature, but it included by far the most important and interesting competition—that for Plainsong. Inaugurated only last year, this competition brought in thirty-seven choirs, who showed as a whole that they understood how plainsong should be interpreted. Twenty-two of the choirs were awarded over eighty marks. The prize—the Joseph Sarto Memorial Cup—was won by Greystones Roman Catholic Church, conducted by the Rev. Father Murnane. Among the many special awards for proficiency in solo singing and playing the Joseph O'Mara Cup for male vocalists was won for the third time by Mr. Frank Cowle. The Festival ended with a prize-winners' concert of thirty-three items.

DUNGANNON (April 23-26).—The fifty-eight classes brought competitors from all over Ulster, and the Festival was, in its general achievement, a success. But the support given by church and school choirs had fallen off, and in seven competitions there were no entries.

PORTADOWN (April 13-17).—Folk-dancing, a new feature, brought sixty-four entries in twelve classes. Solo vocalists were plentiful; when the various winners met in special competition, Miss Muriel Maguire (contralto) won the first place by special gifts of voice and artistry. The playing of the Belfast Co-operative Orchestra, under Mr. R. Orton, was of noteworthy quality.

London Concerts

STELLA MURRAY

There is a repertory of songs which is the special field of the contralto—songs which demand a warm, velvety quality of tone and volume. Miss Stella Murray sings them as well as the best contraltos of the present, avoiding some of the faults to which even the best are liable—such as forcing of the tone and swooping up to the note. The first group of songs in the programme of the recital she gave at Æolian Hall proved this beyond question. Perhaps because of this constant control and restraint she can adapt her voice also to songs of a very different character. There is nothing in Hugo Wolf's 'Come, Mary, take comfort,' or in 'The Gardener' more suitable to a contralto than to a soprano, a baritone, or a tenor. In this the chief qualification is understanding rather than vocal skill, and Miss Murray's complete success in reproducing the fine spiritual atmosphere of the music denotes instincts and temperament of unusual range. Most admirably seconded by Mr. Harold Craxton at the pianoforte, she gave a performance of this and other songs of the same master, the beauty of which I found extraordinarily impressive. F. B.

BOROVSKY

Mr. Borovsky played a programme conventionally arranged into classical and romantic halves at Æolian Hall on April 20. His playing is fresh and enthusiastic, and his technique fluent. This combination of qualities was added in Bach's Chromatic Fantasia to an appreciation of its structural strength and its fundamental rhythm, and in Beethoven's Thirty-two Variations in C minor to an admirable clarity of exposition. Busoni's transcription of the D major Organ Prelude and Fugue was more satisfying than many of these adaptations, because in it Mr. Borovsky was able to produce the illusion of a solid body of tone from the complete range of the pianoforte similar to a complete family of diapasons on an organ. F. H.

PAUL WEINGARTEN

There was maturity of style in the pianoforte playing of Dr. Paul Weingarten, heard at Wigmore Hall on May 7, but whether there was any very profound maturity of thought could hardly be judged from a programme of which the chief feature was Chopin's twenty-four Preludes. He played Beethoven's E flat Sonata from Op. 31, it is true, and played it with verve, which is what this light-hearted Sonata wants. But what was always pleasing in everything he played was the quality and variety of tone which he drew from the instrument. The music was not distorted for the sake of tonal exploitation, but plainly problems of touch and tone have a special interest for Dr. Weingarten, with which in turn he can interest, and, be it added, charm his audience. F. H.

MISS ISOBEL LAMOND

Miss Isobel Lamond, who gave a concert at Wigmore Hall on May 4, sang in an uncommonly pleasing and accomplished way. She was not of the order of recitalists who rush to the platform after a few months of study; she is a serious artist. It was the more surprising, then, after several really good performances, to hear Schubert's 'Frühlingsglaube' taken much too fast and altogether insensitively sung. Sensibility was indeed not a marked characteristic of Miss Lamond's singing; and her bright and well-managed voice was better fitted to the non-German songs. One technical point: some of her high notes might, with advantage, have been more covered. C.

PIANOFORTE DUETS

Pianoforte duet playing demands most of the qualities of good solo playing and some others in addition. The chief of these is a sensitive and accurate sensibility to rhythm. Miss Doris Sheppard and Mr. Gerard Moorat, who played a programme containing Rachmaninov's Suite, a Mozart Sonata, and a transcription of Debussy's 'L'après-midi d'un faune' at Grotrian Hall on May 10, have cultivated by careful listening to each other both this valuable kind of rhythm and a discrimination in tone-colour. Their melody-playing, perhaps, was a little lacking in grace and sustaining power, but their recital was interesting and enjoyable. F. H.

ISOLDE MENGES AND HAROLD SAMUEL

The recital of Pianoforte and Violin Sonatas given by Miss Isolde Menges and Mr. Harold Samuel showed us two artists admirably matched in some respects; both of them serious, thoughtful interpreters, both equally skilled in the technique of their respective instruments. If only the violinist had been the man and the woman the pianist, so that the louder instrument had been in the hands of the gentler partner, we should have had an ideal balance of tone. But Mr. Samuel, forgetting the disparity between a large pianoforte and a tiny fiddle, had the lid of his instrument raised while the violinist could neither raise a lid nor put down a pedal; thus an ideal balance was out of the question. In the Mozart Sonata, where Mr. Samuel exercised greater restraint, the reading was often perfect, and conveyed all the virginal beauty of Mozart's thought. F. B.

HAROLD CRAXTON

The art of making music pleasant to children is an art which most musicians of discrimination possess. The art of making plain to children what music means, what it stands for, and how to approach it, is much rarer. It is because Mr. Harold Craxton is a complete master of both that his recitals for children possess such uncommon interest for the young, who learn without being aware of it, and for the old who see the hook in the bait. Another point which should be noted is that Mr. Craxton, a devoted admirer and student of old English music, never fails to include some examples of it in his recitals. This is essential. The new generation must be made to realise early that there is music essentially British and essentially good if they are to shake off the shyness and the distrust which have hampered the efforts of the present generation to build and organize. F. B.

THE HAROLD BROOKE CHOIR

The excellent concert given at Bishopsgate Institute on May 8 by Mr. Harold Brooke's Choir with the aid of a chamber orchestra of flute (Mr. Gilbert Barton) and strings (led by Mr. Harry Idle), was distinguished by an uncommonly attractive programme. It began with a Purcell Suite, arranged for strings by Mr. Albert Coates, then went on to five part-songs by Elgar to words from 'The Greek Anthology' and a group of songs sung by Miss Odette de Foras, and concluded with an abridged version of the first Act of Handel's Semele.'

The most arresting feature, however, and the only one I was able to hear by missing an Act at Covent Garden, was the Pastoral, 'Lie strewn the white flocks,' by Arthur Bliss, performed for the first time. This work, scored for chorus, including a solo mezzo-soprano, flute (alternating with piccolo), kettledrums, and strings, can without the least fear of exaggeration, be called one of the ripest and most delightful novelties heard in London for some time. Readers of this journal have already been informed that the work is a setting of a little anthology of bucolic poetry ranging from Theocritus to Robert Nichols; they have also been led to expect a good deal from a composer who has been quietly gathering strength and had not appeared as a choral writer before; what now remains to be said is that in performance the 'Pastoral' entirely justifies its apparently somewhat desultory plan and the anticipative praise elicited by a study of the score.

The unity of the work is the more remarkable because it is produced by the composer's power to keep a firm hold of his fancy and his mood rather than by any thematic or formal impositions. Once he has set himself certain restrictions inherent in his subject and medium, he appears to be able to do anything he pleases without once doubting the sureness of his aim. He can be extremely daring in the use of modern resources one moment and, with even greater courage, set down common chords or a diatonic melody the next without producing the least feeling of incongruity. The secret of his unfailing handling, one fancies, is that he is nowadays able to get so wholly inside a given problem of creation that he finds there an abundance of all the invention and the technique he requires, while the temptation to resort to anything that is affected or merely fashionable never arises because it has all been left without.

'OTELLO' AT THE 'OLD VIC.'

Verdi's 'Otello' was new to the 'Old Vic.' audience when it was produced on April 25. Some may say that so exacting a work—one of the most exacting as it is one of the very greatest of operas—should not be tackled by a company of such modest resources; but all said and done, the enterprise was justified—both by the impression made on the audience (who were engrossed throughout and at times wildly excited), and by the opportunity it gave to some very interesting singers to test themselves and find their footing in parts in which it is the height of a singer's ambition to excel.

The sportsmanship of the 'Old Vic.' company predisposes everyone in their favour; but apart from this, one found much in the performance that could be honestly praised. 'Otello' was more adequately presented than some much less difficult operas one has seen at the 'Old Vic.' The principal singers were Miss Joan Cross (Desdemona), Mr. Edward Leer (Othello), and Mr. Herbert Simmonds (Iago). All three surpassed their previous efforts.

The soprano was the most thoroughly accomplished. It is difficult to say for certain whether her singing would have been at all points full enough in a large opera house; one inclines to say yes, for in the dramatic scenes of the third Act it rose to an unexpected force. Miss Cross's great merit, however, lay in the quality of her tone. She is a thoroughly trained singer, and again and again the listener was charmed by the sweetness, purity, and roundness of her notes. Desdemona's part is full of phrases which glorify a good voice, but which are so many traps for the incompetent. A shrill or constricted tone from a would-be Desdemona drives any sensitive listener from the theatre very early in the evening. We stayed on at the 'Old Vic.' till the last fall of the curtain that night.

The young tenor who sang as Othello had already won favourable attention in 'Carmen,' 'Cavalleria,' and 'Lohengrin' (with the B.N.O.C.). He showed he had many of the qualities wanted by an Othello. He is a big fellow; and he strikes one as at home on the stage. Not that his acting was at all points up to the demands of the part. But the shortcomings seemed to be of an order that could have been corrected by coaching. The scene of Othello's death, for instance, missed fire by reason of the unsuitable position in which Mr. Leer found himself (huddled on Desdemona's bed, with his back to the audience) when singing, 'I kissed thee ere I killed thee.' Similarly the beautiful duet in the first Act did not make its due effect—not from faulty singing but from carelessness on the producer's part. Again, inexperience and also a lack of intensity in the conducting robbed 'Ora e per sempre addio' of its full force.

The critical listener could not, for all that, but be greatly interested. Mr. Leer has the gift of being able to stand on the stage without much gesture and yet without any awkwardness. His English is attractive; and his voice has body. At present one feels that the limits of his capacity are undefined. His singing was throughout admirably easy in method and musical in effect. The question in one's mind was whether, tested by a larger stage and a more temperamental conductor, his tone would swell and thunder, or whether it would fail to respond and lack intensity at the great moments. For the 'Old Vic.' stage the volume was certainly adequate, and the singer appeared never to be drawing on his reserves. That, precisely, was what was so interesting. The tone was so steadily musical—so well set—that the singer seemed ripe for a greater dramatic adventurousness. In effect he was a dignified and sympathetic Othello; and it remains to be seen whether he is able to throw a fiercer light on the part.

The Iago was interesting in quite a different way. He lacked what the two other principals had—a conspicuously beautiful voice. This is, whatever may be said, a drawback in a work so essentially musical as 'Otello.' The Iago had, however, a certain compensation to offer in his keen-witted and subtle acting. The Cassio was Mr. Robert Naylor, who may turn out to have a good tenor voice if he can get rid of his disabling 'tightness.' Mr. Corri conducted.

The production boasted some handsome clothes. Those worn by Iago seemed a rather gay choice for so dark a soul. The listener was throughout the evening irritated by the awkward, gritty English of Hueffer's old translation, which mixes unlucky scraps of Shakespeare with ordinary translator's doggerel and hardly ever fits. We do not want to hear Shakespeare's blank verse sung to Verdi's or any other music. English opera singers are incorrigible in their disregard of the quality of the texts they sing. In the days of the Beecham Opera Company, Sir Thomas Beecham and his collaborators went to great pains to improve the translation of 'Otello'; yet in this new production at the 'Old Vic.' the singers have simply taken to the printed verses without a question. Musicians are an unliterary race.

COVENT GARDEN OPERA

The German season at Covent Garden this year has been extremely successful. The policy has been conservative, and the repertory and the company were very much those of previous years.

Strauss's 'Rosenkavalier,' which opened the season, continues to be a great attraction, as well it may be with the best possible set of singers. Lotte Lehmann (the Marschallin) is perhaps the most accomplished and delightful soprano of the day. She was also heard as Eva, as Elsa, and as Sieglinde. In ' Rosenkavalier,' Richard Mayr was again the Baron, and Delia Reinhardt repeated her spritely performance as Octavian ; but there was a new Sophie, Gitta Alpar. She had the girlish looks for the part, but her high notes had not the suavity of Elisabeth Schumann, who later in the season returned to the part in which she had first become known in London.

The ' Ring ' performances boasted Frida Leider's Brünnhilde, which is unmatched in the world to-day. Madame Leider also sang as Isolde with the utmost beauty of tone and with rare intelligence. There were two admirable Wotans, Friedrich Schorr and Rudolf Bockelmann—the former pretty well an ideal Wotan, the latter rather less forceful but still an admirable and majestic singer. Bockelmann's Sachs was a triumph. The beauty of his voice and the amiability of his characterisation won everybody.

In ' Lohengrin ' we heard a new tenor, Fritz Wolff, who also sang as Walther. He was over-praised in some quarters, but this was natural enough, for he was a pleasant and competent singer, which is very much more than can be said of the general run of tenors in German opera. It was much to see someone who looked a fairly credible Lohengrin and Walther. At his best moments his singing was really good ; but the inequalities were frequent, and showed that he has not yet a well-established style. Another new tenor, Erik Enderlein, sang as Tristan quite unacceptably. The Siegfried was, as in previous years, Lauritz Melchior, with whom we must put up as gracefully as we can, for seemingly there is none better. He is stolid and unimaginative, with all his attempts at friskiness. As a declamatory singer he is good ; but he has not a notion of dealing with a lyrical phrase or episode.

The bass, Ivar Andresen, who has sung as Fafner, Mark, Hagen, and the King in ' Lohengrin,' has been magnificent. One could not want to hear a finer bass. He quite outshone Alexander Kipnis, who, too, has a great bass voice, but is inclined to bottle it up. The latter's Pogner was disappointing ; and no one who heard these two singers as Hagen could have the least doubt of their comparative merits.

A few of the singers were not of the sort one goes to Covent Garden to hear. The unfortunate Tristan has been named. The Erda, Anny Andrassy, had all the contralto faults—hooting, scooping, wobbling. And the subscribers to the second ' Ring ' must have been much disappointed to miss Leider in ' Götterdämmerung ' after the glowing accounts that had been given of her performance in the first cycle ; for the second Brünnhilde, Elisabeth Ohms, sang deplorably badly. She had also been the Brünnhilde in the first ' Siegfried,' and in both cycles she ruined the love-music of the third Act of the third evening.

The conductors were Bruno Walter and Robert Heger. C.

'THERE 'S NO FOOL LIKE A YOUNG FOOL'

Méhul's operetta ' Le Jeune Sage et le Vieux Fou ' was revived at a performance of the Arts Theatre with some success. It is the sort of thing which demands for its full effect a touch of the formality which is one facet of the genius of the French theatre. Its shafts (not very vicious) require a hard target ; they fail to pierce more pliable, elastic material. Mr. Frederick Ranalow was delightful yet reminiscent in pose and gesture of the bold, bad Captain Macheath—and there is the crux of the matter, for obviously some discrimination is necessary between the hero of the ' Beggar's Opera ' and a French viveur. The other parts were also adequately presented, but here again the precedent of the ' Beggar's Opera ' intruded. It is very probable that, but for the interest aroused by that revival, we should have never heard ' There 's no fool like a young fool.' But it is certain that if Gay's opera is to have a worthy successor, this will have to be something more than an imitation. Variety is a need in the theatre as in life, and the ' Beggar's Opera ' succeeded just because it gave us something the present generation had never seen.

The music, which does not lack a certain charm, was adequately sung by the chief singers—barely adequately played by the orchestra. Incidentally it may be said that the ' Beggar's Opera ' has brought about a perfect epidemic of curtseying. Any actress or singer wearing 18th-century costume will bob up and down twice every minute. There was far too much of it in ' There 's no fool like a young fool.' F. B.

Music in the Suburbs

' Jephtha ' was performed by the Catford Choral Society, under Mr. A. M. Gifford, on April 18, with Miss Ethel Waddington, Miss Freda Haynes, Mr. Robert Leeds, and Mr. Charles Phillips as principal soloists.

The Alexandra Choral Society, under Mr. Allen Gill, brought its season to an end on April 20 with the abridged concert versions of ' Carmen ' and ' Faust.'

At a concert of the Harrow Philharmonic Society, on April 20, the conductor, Mr. Harry Idle, played Tartini's D minor Violin Concerto, while Mr. Harold Rawlinson (whose Overture ' The Maid of Orleans ' had opened the programme) conducted. The Symphony was Haydn's ' Oxford.'

On April 23 Dartford Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Ernest Leeds, gave ' Judas Maccabæus,' with the assistance of Eltham Orchestral Society, whose conductor is Mr. F. J. Francis.

The programme played by the Croydon Symphony Orchestra, on April 24, under the direction of Mr. W. H. Reed, included Brahms's first Symphony, Mozart's D major Violin Concerto, played by Mr. Harold Fairhurst, and Holst's Fugal Concerto for oboe and flute, with Mr. Léon Goossens and Mr. Joseph Slater as soloists.

The choral works performed by the Ealing Philharmonic Society, under Mr. Victor Williams, on April 27, were Parry's ' The Pied Piper of Hamelin ' and Frederick Austin's ' Songs in a Farmhouse.' The orchestra played the Adagio and Allegro movements from Brahms's first Symphony.

The Thames Valley Orchestral Association gave a concert on May 1 under its new conductor, Mr. F. W. Wiltshire. The music included the ' New World ' Symphony and Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto, played by Mr. A. A. Gregory.

Willesden Green and Cricklewood Choral Society brought its thirty-second season to an end with a performance of ' King Olaf,' under the direction of Mr. F. W. Belchamber.

'THE BRIDE OF DIONYSUS'

Prof. Tovey has his own theories as to what opera should be—theories explained in a pamphlet which I have tried, but so far failed, to obtain. The practice is exemplified in a three-Act opera, ' The Bride of Dionysus,' which was performed for the first time at Edinburgh a few weeks ago.

I cannot pretend to deduce the theory from practical application. No matter in what respects ' The Bride of Dionysus ' may differ from other operas, its success or failure depends on how far it conforms to or departs from certain standards more or less generally accepted and applicable to all forms of dramatic writing. The exact share that should be allotted in opera to each of the three sister arts is a matter often discussed and never settled. But it is generally acknowledged that the elder sister—music—is entitled to special treatment, for the simple reason that first-rate music can atone to some extent for indifferent poetry and inadequate scenery, while no poetic excellence or scenic splendour can mitigate the tedium of bad music. We shall not be greatly in error then if we try to appraise ' The Bride of Dionysus ' mainly as a work of music.

The subject of the opera is the legend of Theseus, the Greek hero who went to Crete, slew the Minotaur, carried off Ariadne, and then abandoned her in Naxos, where the god Dionysus wooed and won her again. It was no doubt Prof. Tovey's allegiance to the classical world that caused him to carry the story up to this point. Dionysus makes his appearance only in the last Act, and if the other Acts had failed to stimulate our interest nobody would have cared what happened to Ariadne. The real interest of the first and second Acts is in the antagonism between the champion of the victims, Theseus, and the tyrant, Minos. Although Prof. Tovey's sympathy for and understanding of the Greek myth may not be questioned, as a musician his heart is with the romantics. He praises Theseus the hero with his lips; Theseus the lover he extols with his whole soul. The whole of the first Act is emotionally lukewarm. We recognise the heroic character of certain themes without effort; they do not, however, force us to share the joy and exultation of the hero's exploit or the fears of his companions. The situations are handled with considerable skill, but not with the magic power of the born dramatist who convinces us that of all the sorrows in the world one sorrow alone matters—that, for the time being, the fate of one man is our only concern. When in the second Act Theseus is joined by Ariadne and Phædra, then the music begins to glow, and we give ourselves without reserve to the sway of Tovey's sensitive, tender song.

Long before the end of the Act the listener will have come to the conclusion that the opera has great merits and, also, a certain weakness which revision could easily amend. I should like to hear the opera in London performed by a company of singers as enthusiastic as the amateurs who undertook the not easy task of its performance at Edinburgh, but more experienced in the technique of vocalisation and of stage action. The admirable settings designed by Mr. Charles Ricketts would please and the finer pages of the music must delight any public.

DINNER TO SIR DAN GODFREY

Many different phases of musical life and activity were represented in the restaurant of Bournemouth's new Pavilion on Thursday, April 25, when a complimentary dinner was given to Sir Dan Godfrey. The affair was organized by the British Music Society's local centre. Sir Hugh Allen presided.

Proposing 'The Guest of the Evening,' the chairman produced first of all 'a bouquet of good wishes'—greetings and messages from such eminent musicians as Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Sir Thomas Beecham, Sir Edward Elgar, Sir Landon Ronald, Dame Ethel Smyth, and Dr. Vaughan Williams. Sir Dan, he observed, was known throughout the Empire as the friend of British music. He had proved a man of first-rate musical gifts, indomitable pluck, unending patience; with a love of hard work—especially in other people!—an insistence on detail, and a suavity of manner which had no equal. He was one of those who stood for the worth-whileness of music, as something of immense value to the human race. He had made people realise that one of Bournemouth's great health-renewing properties was its music. He had demonstrated his belief not merely in the value and validity of music, but also in the value and validity of British music and composers.

Mr. Graham Peel, in supporting the toast, said he spoke as representing those who had long regarded the music at the Winter Gardens as an essential part of their life here all the year round.

Sir Dan Godfrey mentioned, in the course of his grateful response, that during the last thirty-five years over a hundred and fifty British composers had conducted works of their own at Bournemouth, whilst British works performed there numbered between nine hundred and a thousand.

Mr. A. Hamilton Law offered to Sir Dan a tribute of affection and esteem from 'brother and sister professionals in the town.'

HONEGGER AT CAMBRIDGE

Cambridge is evidently set upon becoming the centre of musical enterprise in England. Apart from the tri-annual excursion into the sphere of early English opera, it is rapidly leading the way with performances of modern works such as Kodály's 'Psalmus Hungaricus,' Stravinsky's 'L'Histoire du Soldat,' and, finally, Honegger's 'King David,' which was performed in its original form under the composer's direction at the Cambridge Guildhall on May 11. As an oratorio this work is something of an enigma to most people; the constant explanatory interruptions by the 'Speaker' in the concert version prove irritating, and tend more than anything to emphasise the lack of continuity in the work. But the performance of 'King David' with the attendant play—a rather muddled dramatisation by René Morax of some of the best things in the Old Testament crowded into twenty-four scenes—has revealed what a mistake it has previously been to perform only Honegger's music, especially in the concert room, where there is something incongruous in a large orchestra playing a number of what are virtually thumb-nail sketches intended to enhance the atmosphere of a play of which the audience knows little or nothing.

In the theatre, however, with the original score (for a small orchestra of wind, percussion, and basses) the music assumes its proper proportions—although the standard of the production at Cambridge was such that the evening remains in the memory as one of interesting music with an incidental play. Nevertheless, the lyrical beauty of certain passages in the music, which is only to be expected from the composer of the Pastorale d'été,' and (though slightly bombastic) the occasionally moving treatment of the life and death of King David combined, with all due respect to the efforts of the undergraduate producers, designers, &c., to whet the appetite for an adequate production in London with a professional company. While their sincerity is obvious, these amateur affairs seem too often to be glorified children's charades complete with paper hats and bath towels, at any rate to the eye. And at the risk of appearing ungrateful for the intentions of the Cambridge people, would it not be pertinent to suggest that they content themselves with playing with toy trains and leave Honegger's vast Pacific locomotive to the qualified engine-driver? It would be safer.

Mr. Peter Hannan, promising son of a distinguished father, made a handsome David, though his occasional 'staginess' must possibly be attributed to faults in production, which was altogether too 'precious' and clever for the simplicity of treatment which the play demands.

BACH FESTIVAL AT PORTSMOUTH

The Portsmouth Elizabethan and Bach Society gave a very successful Bach Festival on April 27. There were two concerts. In the afternoon Miss Dorothy Silk and Mr. Arthur Cranmer sang arias, Mr. Harold Samuel played the Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue, Messrs. Harold Samuel, Stanley Blagrove, and Charles Souper were soloists in the Triple Concerto in A minor, and the orchestra played the 'Brandenburg' Concerto in G, and Parry's 'English' Suite. The evening concert was largely choral, with the Cantatas, 'A Stronghold Sure,' 'God's time is the best,' and the Magnificat, in which the vocal soloists named above were joined by Miss Freda Foster and Mr. Osmond Davies. Mr. Victor Spanner played the continuo, and the accompanist throughout was Miss Muriel Anderson. Mr. Léon Goossens was heard in oboe solos, and Miss Irene Spurgeon and Mr. Stanley Blagrove played the Concerto for two violins. The conductors were Dr. Adrian Boult and Mr. Hugh Burry. The performances all round reached a very high standard, and the concerts were well attended.

TALLIS'S FORTY-PART MOTET

PERFORMANCE AT NEWCASTLE

The Newcastle Bach Choir sang this famous but little-known masterpiece at their twenty-second recital in St. Nicholas's Cathedral. Not content with singing it once, they gave it three times—an excellent way of doing something to make up for the neglect of the work, and also a help to its understanding by the audience. No doubt performers and hearers alike did it the fullest justice at the third time of asking.

The programme included also Byrd's four-part Mass, and some old and new violin and organ music of great interest (Miss Christina Collinge, Mr. William Ellis, and Mr. Thomas Christy). Dr. Whittaker conducted.

Music in the Provinces

BATH.—A programme of music by the late André Messager was given at the Pump Room on May 2, as a compliment to the composer's widow, Madame Temple-Messager, who was on a visit to Bath.

BOSTON.—At the annual concert of the Boston Choral Society on April 26 the choral music, conducted by Dr. Bernard Jackson, included 'The Revenge,' and a selection of madrigals and part-songs. Miss Dorothy Silk was the singer, and the Yorkshire String Quartet played Dittersdorf and Haydn.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Two works were given their first performance under the direction of their composers on April 25. These were Stanley Wilson's 'Skye Symphony,' and a Concert Overture by Mr. F. King-Hall.——On that evening Sir Dan Godfrey was the guest of honour at a dinner given by the Bournemouth centre of the British Music Society, with Sir Hugh Allen in the chair.——A violin recital was given by Mr. Noel V. Hale at Alexandra Hall on April 16.

BURY.—The annual concert of the Musical Society took the form of a performance of Brahms's 'Requiem' and Schubert's 'Song of Miriam' in the Cathedral. Mr. Percy Hallam conducted, and the principal singers were Miss Elsie Suddaby and Mr. Frederick Woodhouse.

EVESHAM.—The new Evesham Orchestral and Choral Society made its first public appearance on April 10, under the direction of Mr. A. M. Slatter. The principal works were 'The Banner of St. George' and movements from Haydn's 'Surprise' Symphony. The choir and orchestra numbered eighty performers.

GLOUCESTER.—At the annual concert of the Gloucestershire Orchestral Society, on April 11, Mr. H. W. Sumsion conducted the 'New World' Symphony. The orchestra, as usual, was led by its instructor, Mr. W. H. Reed. The Society is now in its twenty-eighth season.——Trios by Schubert (B flat), Ravel, and Frank Bridge were played to the Gloucester Chamber Music Society by the Pirani Trio.

IPSWICH.—On April 17 the Choral Society was conducted for the first time by its new conductor, Mr George C. Gray, who succeeds Mr. W. H. Dixon. The works performed were Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' Haydn's 'Spring,' and Stanford's 'Phaudrig Crohoore.' The soloists were Miss Violette Browne, Mr. Walter Glynne, and Mr. Keith Falkner.

KEMPSTON.—A selection from 'Solomon' was the first half of the programme given by the Kempston Musical Society on May 2, under the direction of Mr. George Ramsay.

LEEDS.—Miss Kathleen Frise-Smith gave a concert of Pianoforte Concertos with the Leeds Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Julius Harrison. Her programme included works by Gordon Jacob and Ernest Bloch.

LEICESTER.—The first performance of 'The Apostles' at Leicester was given by the Philharmonic Society under Sir Henry Wood on April 9. The solo parts were taken by Miss Kate Winter, Miss Valetta Iacopi, Mr. Eric Green, Mr. Arthur Cranmer, Mr. Horace Stevens, and Mr. Frederick Woodhouse.

LIVERPOOL.—An ambitious programme was creditably achieved by the Bach Choir under Dr. J. E. Wallace on May 9. It consisted of Vaughan Williams's 'Flos Campi' and 'Sancta Civitas,' and Holst's 'Ode to Death.'

MAIDSTONE.—On April 22 the Maidstone Choral Union, conducted by Mr. F. Wilson Parish, gave a programme that consisted largely of the test-pieces with which the choir has won its competition success. It included the Rhinemaidens' music, Holst's 'Lord, Who hast made us,' Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' Elgar's 'Feasting, I watch,' Gibbons's 'Oh, that the learned poets,' and Parry's 'My soul, there is a country.'——The Amateur Orchestra played Beethoven's eighth Symphony under Mr. Hubert Foster Clark.

MANCHESTER.—Mr. Frank Merrick's additional movements to the 'Unfinished' Symphony, which were awarded the second prize in the recent Schubert competition, were performed by the Northern Wireless Orchestra, under Mr. F. H. Morrison, at the Mid-day concert on April 23.——Holbrooke's 'Bronwen' was given by the Carl Rosa Company on May 8, under Mr. Arthur Hammond.

NORWICH.—On May 2, Mozart's 'Requiem' was given by the Philharmonic Society under the direction of Dr. Statham. The performance was preceded by Bach's 'Doric' Fugue, played by Mr. Maddern Williams.

PENZANCE.—The 'Eroica' Symphony was performed on April 17 by the Penzance Orchestral Society, under the direction of Mr. Walter Barnes.

PLYMOUTH.—The new Plymouth Chamber Music Trio, consisting of Mr. Percy Lowman (violin), Miss Winifred Blight ('cello), and Mr. Douglas M. Durston (pianoforte), gave their first concert on April 17. Their programme included the Fantasy Trio in B minor by H. V. Jervis-Read.

PORTSMOUTH.—The North End Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Ernest Birch, ended its season on April 17 with 'St. Paul.'

READING.—Stanford's 'The Battle of the Baltic,' Haydn's 'Spring,' and the 'Surprise' Symphony were the chief works performed by the Reading Philharmonic Society on April 10, under the direction of Mr. P. R. Scrivener.

REDHILL.—Beethoven's fourth Symphony, a 'Pavane' by Fauré, and 'Puck's Minuet,' by Herbert Howells, were played by the Redhill Society of Instrumentalists on April 22. The orchestra, conducted by Mr. W. H. Reed, consisted of sixty players led by well-known professionals.

ST. AUSTELL.—The St. Stephens-in-Brannel Choral Society, conducted by Mr. C. H. Baker, gave Parts 1 and 2 of 'The Song of Hiawatha' on April 11.

SHOSCOMBE.—This village near Bath supports a male-voice choir and a children's choir that is in the habit of winning prizes at the Bristol Eisteddfod and the Mid-Somerset Competitions. Recently a mixed-voice choir was also formed, under the conductorship of Mr. Hubert A. Bending. Its first concert, with a miscellaneous programme, was held with success on April 24.

SITTINGBOURNE.—On April 24 the Sittingbourne and District Musical Society gave a performance of 'The Creation.' Mr. W. J. Keech conducted, and the solo parts were sung by Miss Dorothy Bennett, Mr. Leonard Gowings, and Mr. Topliss Green.

STROUD.—The Choral Society's programme on May 2 included Parry's 'Voces Clamantium' and Mozart's 'Requiem.' Mr. S. W. Underwood conducted.

WHITTLESEY.—The Choral Society gave a performance of 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast' on April 25, under Dr. Hayward Scott, with Mr. Harry Hartley as soloist and Miss Beryl Scott as accompanist and solo pianist.

YARMOUTH.—'Valdemar,' a new choral work by Mr. Thomas M. Tunbridge, was performed by the Gt. Yarmouth Musical Society on April 18, with Miss Gwladys Naish and Mr. Charles Knowles as solo singers and Madame Korchinska as harpist. The choir had been trained by Dr. Haydon Hare, and the composer conducted.

Music in Wales

BANGOR.—The weekly concerts at University College were continued up to the end of May. The programmes given during the present term have included Trios by Brahms (in C major), John Ireland (the second Phantasy), Mendelssohn (in C minor), and Beethoven (the 'Serenade' Trio for flute and strings). The College String Quartet, whose ensemble is rapidly attaining to a high standard, gave interesting performances of Mozart in C and Beethoven's Op. 131. The principal event of the year took place on May 8, when the University Choral Society and the Bangor Orchestra, with contingents from the Hallé Orchestra, gave a highly impressive performance of the 'St. Matthew' Passion, under Mr. E. T. Davies. The great Prichard-Jones Hall was filled to its utmost capacity—the audience including about four hundred students from the various local colleges. The soloists were Dorothy Silk, Margaret Corbold, Tom Pickering, Keith Falkner, and Dr. Ivor Evans.

BARRY.—On May 11, 12, and 13 the Great Western Railway Social and Educational Union held a week-end conference in which music figured largely. On May 11, mixed-voice choirs from Caerphilly and Swindon, conducted by Mr. Stephen Knight, sang a number of part-songs, including Leslie's 'Lullaby of Life,' Gounod's 'By Babylon's Wave,' and German's 'Orpheus with his Lute.' On May 12 a Festival of Song was held in Romilly Park. The band of the Swindon Branch of the Union, conducted by Mr. J. Lennon, contributed several instrumental items, and combined male-voice choirs drawn from Aberystwyth, Barry, Carmarthen, Cardiff, Newport, Port Talbot, and Romilly, gave a series of male-voice part-songs from a song-book specially compiled for the occasion by Sir Walford Davies.

BLAENAVON and BRYNMAWR.—Sir Walford Davies, as Director of the National Council of Music, paid visits to these two centres in the distressed areas of Wales on May 13, for the purpose of co-operating with the workers for the mental and social welfare of the unemployed miners. At Blaenavon, a cinema intended to seat a thousand people was crammed with fifteen hundred, who listened intently to his address, while a chorus of a hundred stood throughout, joining in singing his customary illustrations with remarkable spontaneity and enthusiasm, as well as singing some choruses from 'The Messiah.' At Brynmawr, the miners proved that distress and music go wonderfully well together. The meetings were vital and the attention was profound. Sir Walford was accompanied by a violinist, Miss Doreen Heel, who played a number of illustrations.

CARDIFF.—The National Orchestra of Wales is keeping up its high standard of playing, and continues to supply a series of free concerts in the National Museum and subscription concerts. Latterly it has embarked on a series of Sunday night concerts in Park Hall. Mendelssohn's 'Fingal's Cave' and Beethoven's 'Coriolanus' Overtures, Schubert's 'Tragic' and Brahms's C minor Symphonies, Saint-Saëns's 'Cello Concerto in A minor, Rimsky-Korsakov's Pianoforte Concerto in C minor, and a Symphonic Poem, 'On the Cotswolds,' by Mr. Reginald Redman, a local composer, are a few of the most interesting instrumental items recently given.——On May 13, Mr. Herbert Ware's string orchestra gave a concert of chamber-music, which included works by Purcell, Handel, Mendelssohn, Rachmaninov, and Max Bruch. ——On the same day, at the Drill Hall, occurred the first Cardiff Schools Musical Festival, organized by a committee of school teachers on suggestions made by the National Council of Music and its Director. The children were divided into two parties, West Cardiff being represented in the afternoon by five hundred, and East Cardiff in the evening by five hundred and five. There was also a composite school orchestra, conducted by Mr. Roy Monkcom, which played Haydn's 'London' Symphony very creditably.

HARLECH.—The important Musical Festival took place on Whit Monday. Massed singing by twenty-one choirs, comprising two thousand voices, was a notable feature, the huge audience joining in Welsh hymns, under the direction of Mr. Tudor Owen and Mr. Harry Jones. An up-to-date touch was provided by a massed-choir performance outside the Castle walls for a talking film. In a day of mixed delights the outstanding event was a performance of 'The Messiah' by about eighteen hundred voices, conducted by Sir Hugh Allen. The singing was remarkable for its flexibility and unanimity, especially as there was no opportunity for combined rehearsal. The soloists were Miss Mair Jones, Miss May Rowlands, Mr. Evan Lewis, and Mr. Norman Allin; there was an excellent orchestra, chiefly composed of students from Bangor and Aberystwyth Universities, and led by Mr. Vasco Akeroyd, of Liverpool.

ORGANISTS' LONG SERVICE ROLL OF HONOUR

By C. W. PEARCE

First, a few errata, with apologies to all concerned. The November, 1928, list should have been numbered V., not IV. No. 262 (October, p. 939) should read George Bernard (not Barnard) Gilbert, and his tenure of office at West Ham Church was forty-five, not fifty, years, having been appointed in 1859 (not 1874). No. 287 (November, p. 1026) has the surname omitted; the entry should read Thomas Leighton Fry. In List II., No. 144, Mr. J. W. Lawson's tenure of office at St. Mary Redcliffe, Bristol, should have been given as forty-four years—1862-1906—when he was succeeded by Mr. Ralph T. Morgan, the present organist. In List V., No. 286, read Baxter (not Baptist) Church.

Every organist who is able to regard with pleasurable satisfaction a present or past long-service tenure of office must have been sorry to read in the Musical Times recent issues the unhappy experiences of some of his younger brethren. Sometimes, however (but not always), there may be faults on both sides to account for such abnormal circumstances. Highly-strung nerves may render an accomplished organist more or less susceptible of irritation, &c., which too often finds a vent in hasty words and deeds; and on the other side, a hard matter-of-fact clergyman with no music in his soul can scarcely be expected to deal patiently and tactfully with what is known as the sensitive 'artistic temperament' of a subordinate person. And should another cleric possess a 'slight knowledge of music,' the position is scarcely less dangerous. Even some of the most enlightened parsons may not be altogether innocent of giving offence by inadvertent and incautious remarks. In this connection I recall one of the funny stories of my old master, E. J. Hopkins. His great chum, Jeremiah Rogers, of Doncaster Parish Church, having heard one day from a churchwarden friend that the usually genial Vicar (afterwards Dean of Llandaff and Master of the Temple) had incidentally expressed his dislike of seeing his organist wearing a long black coat and white tie, 'looking as if he were one of the curates,' exclaimed, with excusable warmth, 'If I thought there were any likelihood of my being mistaken for one of those miserable creatures, I'd go and drown myself.'

Mutual sympathy is quite a good password to the successful career of a church organist: a high-minded 'give-and-take' two-sided policy, which needs no backing up at the hands of any third party, institutional or individual. Every church official in the discharge of his duty has to maintain the 'even tenor of his way,' by overlooking as best he can divers ecclesiastical eccentricities, whether displayed in the pulpit or out of it. One of Sir John Stainer's amusing University anecdotes may be cited by way of illustration, which I here venture to recall in Limerick fashion, thus:

'There was at St. Mary's, in Oxford,
An old verger who placed upon record,
That in spite of much preaching,
And all kinds of teaching,
He remained still a Christian, in Oxford.'

BRAHMS AS SYMPHONIST

By J. H. ELLIOT

There is a tendency observable in certain aspects of current criticism to deny the existence of a complete and all-round significance in the symphonic music of Brahms. However greatly his essays in this field may be esteemed from the structural and even the æsthetic points of view, there would appear to be certain reservations with regard to the cumulative value of the several constituents, each of which is, in itself, admitted to be significant. 'Morose and ascetic' is a phrase recently applied by Mr. Cecil Gray to the E minor Symphony; nor is he alone in inveighing against Brahms with polite variants upon the celebrated accusation of 'flat-footed pedantry.'

That this attitude towards Brahms should still persist in any form is remarkable. The contemporary depreciation, in that it implied comparison with coincident developments of a more openly picturesque nature, can readily be understood; but, having regard to historical perspective, there can be small excuse for it at this time of day. Moreover, the contention that Brahms is, musically speaking, a dual personality is untenable. The argument would seem to be that, whereas the songs of Brahms are openly romantic, his symphonic music takes a conscious neo-classical form which muffles and distorts the proper trend of his inspiration. This, however, is to ignore the fact that the traditions of song and symphony, to which Brahms adhered—at all events in broad outline—more closely than any other composer of recent times, had taken root in entirely different fields. That is, the tradition of art-song, as laid down by Schubert and Schumann, already evinced the frankly poetic emphasis of romanticism, whereas the cyclic instrumental forms were conditioned in the first instance by classical ideals. This in itself, however, is far from touching the heart of the matter. In point of fact, it is in no way legitimate to regard Brahms's symphonic music as being primarily actuated by formal considerations.

In his symphonic music, Brahms encompasses a subtle balance between the emotional and the structural aspects of the art, each being entirely dependent upon the other. There can be no question of a consciously-wrought synthesis. The intrinsic character of the themes is wholly consistent with the peculiar nature of their presentment and treatment. The purely rhapsodic style is, in fact, opposed to the authentic Brahmsian scheme, which remains inherently logical in each of its emotional conditions. The slow movement of the late Double Concerto, lovely though it is, lacks the true characteristics of the composer, and evinces a languorous absence of that elemental virility which is a vital trait of his real make-up. Where structural considerations are most potent, indeed, Brahms is most completely himself and most æsthetically satisfying. His appeal is essentially different from that of Wagner, notwithstanding the singular points of contact in the music of the two great contemporaries; for where Wagner directly addresses the emotions, encompassing an intellectual appeal only incidentally, Brahms evokes a dual response by conveying implications through a channel whose shape is coincidentally determined by purely musical values. Moreover, the manifestation of Brahms's emotional scheme is infinitely the most successful where it is least self-evident. The frankly dramatic trend of the first Symphony inclines to an over-emphasis of its subjective considerations, whereas the second Symphony, at first sight primarily abstract and patternistic, is fundamentally a more natural expression of the composer's scheme of ideation. Its general impulse is by no means predominantly classical, and its exquisite structure—the first movement, from the point of view of design alone, is one of the most beautifully-wrought numbers in the whole realm of music—is the vehicle of a genre of musical thought such as no thorough-going classicist would or could have conceived; nor without this particular felicity of design could the underlying conceptions have been so perfectly manifested. The unique tenderness and tranquillity of the movement are not fortuitous side-issues of a purely formal display of thematic developments and transformations, but the very conditions which inform the entire conception.

It cannot be maintained that Brahms allowed the classical traditions entirely to dominate his symphonic work. To concede in the main his adherence to the older traditions is far from admitting the absence of any definite progress. Brahms was at no time chained to the wheel of sonata form, or any other merely formal convention established by precedent in the practice of his forbears. His classicality, in point of fact, subsisted only in his natural use of structural devices which could be accounted for on the ground of musical logic alone, and in his independence of any completely extra-musical system of values such as those which condition the formal content of the dramatic and programmatic essays of many of his contemporaries. The musical shape of his songs, for instance, is not determined absolutely by the nature of the poems, as in the case of Wolf. At the same time, Brahms was not content to follow meekly along set and established lines: his formulæ are wrought from the application of his individual genius to the existent traditions of musical form—a process which was not consciously undergone, but which arose necessarily from his own peculiar conception of æsthetic values.

The austerity ascribed to certain of Brahms's symphonic music can be conceived only as a misapprehension arising either from cursory listening or from a preoccupation with structural values alone. To impute austerity to the fourth Symphony is to admit that formal considerations still obscure the issue in the mind of the critic. The point is not so much whether the Finale is a passacaglia as whether it is the proper vehicle of the emotional condition which prompted it. Had Brahms been consciously obsessed with formal conventions, he would certainly not have employed a form so apparently foreign to the symphonic conditions. The result is, humanly speaking, perfect. The formal trend of that massive movement serves inimitably the noble, triumphant mood—exultant rather than stern—which informs it; the whole conception is permeated with an electric vitality that is every whit as potent as that of Wagner in his most dynamic moments, and is certainly more subtle and rarefied. This musical and emotional subtlety is, moreover, common to Brahms's symphonic music generally; it is essentially natural and characteristic, and cannot be regarded in any sense as a failure, either complete or comparative.

SUPPOSITIONAL HEARING

Mr. E. J. Chadfield read a paper with the above title at the meeting of the Musical Association on March 19. He pointed out that in the process of hearing sounds there were many parts of it, inaudible by themselves, which had much effect on the conscious sensation of sound, and far more on the mental perception of the intricate and delicate meanings which sounds could convey, especially in the less obvious discords. A musical sound needed a border of silence for its production, its reception, and its retention. Similarly, any musical idea must have a halo of separation from other things which it is not, to become a distinct identity; and what we know, see, and feel about it is the border of what and where it is not, surrounding what and where it is. The musical scientist must consider all parts of the process of musical production, those that operate in silence as well as those that are audible, before the whole sphere of music can be covered.

The lecturer referred to the structure of the ear, with its twenty-thousand fibres, the function of which he described. Scientists say that a single musical sound must disturb a number of adjacent fibres, the height and breadth of the disturbed area varying with the loudness of the sound. The positive sensation was increased by its negative surroundings—not by their inaction, but by their living movement in an opposite direction. And if positive sounds could be subconsciously received, the negative movements of adjacent fibres could also be conveyed to the brain by the ear, not as audible sounds, but as silent possibilities associated with the actual vibrations.

Being subconscious, vibration numbers were as useless as names for the musical description of sounds, but their use in mathematics showed that sounds could be related. Just as children could hear the pitch of a sound, without any knowledge of the number, so they could hear the tune and relationship of two sounds without knowing the ratio of two sounds, without knowing the ratio of their two numbers; yet the ratio was there all the time. When the two sounds are out of tune, so that the intended ratio of small numbers had no actual existence, children could not only hear the adjacent possibility, but they could frequently say how the sounds were wrong, and whether the false tune they heard was too great or too small.

Then followed this most remarkable feature of the faculty of Suppositional Hearing. When two sounds were accompanied with other sounds, so that they implied a non-existent ratio, and when, afterwards, other sounds were added to the two, so that they implied another non-existent ratio, the majority of children not only could declare that a difference was implied, but could tell which of the two implied tunes was the larger. There was, of course, no possible physical difference, yet they could compare the one implied and non-existent possibility with the other, when they could hear only a mechanical parody of both, in the keyboard sounds offered to them. Their perception was due to their musical instinct for Just Intonation. This extraordinary science demanded a mathematical accuracy almost beyond physical attainment with sensible sounds, and far beyond the powers of common keyboards. With voices, string viols, and ears we had all the necessary machinery for the production and enjoyment of the most perfect enharmonic harmony, of delicate moving discords, and truly restful concords, but the suggested accuracy of Just Intonation was so minute that its existence in music was almost incredible. A new keyboard with sixty keys to the octave could only be a clumsy caricature of the human ear, with its hundred sounds to a semitone.

While we aspired to the perfections that our ears told us were possible, yet we enjoyed mechanical distortions of our ideas, and mentally whitewashed their obvious lies and pretences. Nevertheless, it was this acceptance of mistuning that made poor music a pleasure for many thick-eared folk, and made the profession of music possible for many musicians of moderate ability. The ears of keyboard musicians must of necessity become callous to errors of enharmonic pitch. The keyboard musician had no control over the pitch of the sounds produced by the instrument. The pianoforte was the most simple, easy, coarse, vulgar, popular parody of the refinements of harmony that had so far been adapted to the democratic requirements of the lowest classes of musical humanity, for harmonic pretensions. It had obliterated the refined sense of melody and of the delicate gradations of pitch that we found in unperverted ears.

After devoting some time to examples of enharmonic variation and their effect on the ear, Mr. Chadfield went on to say that the ear seemed to be more tolerant than the mind. It accepted a substitute two third-parts of a semitone from Just Intonation. The mind, however, disliked using the name of the home-sound, towards which it was moving, and preferred the travelling name of a different sound, when only one third-part of a semitone from its destination. The musical mind and ear acted in opposite directions. The mind began with the perfect idea and tried to find it, and the obstinate inability to accept a substitute was proportionate to the distinct simplicity of the idea. The ear began with the material, and tried to take all of it, with all its surroundings, positive and negative together, so that the best might be selected as required by the mind. The ear accepted, and the mind selected if it wanted, just as the mind saw, not what was to be seen, but what it looked to find. It was quite possible that the same audible sounds might suggest different perfect ratios to different people; but it was not possible to think out of tune, and if the mind was not fixed on one perfect idea, it must be fixed on another.

When the ancients spoke of 'consonance' they meant melodic relation of sounds, not the concord or discord of combined sounds. They thought the whole tone was a consonance in melody, although it is now considered a discord in harmony. But its meaning in music was altered by the direction of movement, upwards or downwards. When two sounds, A and B, were represented by their vibration ratio, they might be named 8 and 9, difference 1, but the musical effect was not the positive difference, but the relative result and consequence of their comparison. The consequence of moving from 8 to 9 was nine times the difference, while the consequence of moving from 9 to 8 was only eight times the difference. The static positive difference was the same, but the direction of the movement altered the consequent comparison and musical effect. The musical meaning of A to B, or of B to A, might be expectant or final, according to the intended ratio, which the two sounds were unable to explain without a third sound to corroborate the ratio, and complete the triangle by defining the destination or meaning of the movement. The musical effect was the superlative intention, not the difference, nor the amount, of movement.

HOLLAND

A good finish to the season at The Hague was given by the celebrations of the centenary of the existence of the local branch of the Maatschappij tot Bevordering der Toonkunst, which took the form of a choral concert under the Society's own conductor, the first half of the programme being constructed of works by Dutch composers—Wagenaar, Richard Hol, Bernard Zweers, and Alphons Diepenbrock. Apart from the Te Deum of the last-named, the works were pleasant rather than striking, but they gave a good idea of the development which was taking place during the last two decades of the 19th century. Bach's cantata 'Wachet, betet!' provided some excellent singing; and the Greeting of Hans Sachs and closing chorus from 'Die Meistersinger' formed an appropriate finish particularly as this was in addition the farewell concert of Dr. Wagenaar, who, in the six years he has been connected with The Hague branch (he was previously at Utrecht), has won both the admiration and the affection of his chorus and officials. Very striking was the spontaneous repetition of this last chorus as a tribute to the conductor when the wreath of the choir was presented to him; it was even better sung than in its place in the programme.

A few recitals of interest have also filled in the close of the season, among them being three in rapid succession by Ethel Bartlett and Rae Robertson (who can now be said to have won a definite following among the public, as well as splendid appreciation from the press) and one by Harriet Cohen, a Bach evening with a small—a too small—chamber orchestra. Miss Cohen's own playing, both at The Hague and Amsterdam, was highly praised, her artistic development since she last appeared here being pronounced to be on the right lines in the way of increasing steadiness and deeper insight into the music she played. More than one critic declared her to be a Bach interpreter par excellence.

ITALY

MILAN

The now rapidly-approaching end of the season is making itself felt in a general falling-off both in the quality of the music and in its performance. At the Conservatorio there has been little else but students' recitals, with an occasional foreign artist thrown in.

At the opera, since Toscanini's return, there have been several performances of 'Aida,' with, in the first instance, Arangi Lombardi in the title-rôle, and, later, Elizabeth Rethberg. Both are very fine singers indeed. It was Rethberg's debut at La Scala. One can easily understand why she is so popular in the United States. To a very beautiful voice—one is almost tempted to say a perfect voice—is joined an artistry in every way exceptional.

It was very disappointing to have to do without 'Don Giovanni' this year, but the engagement of the entire company for a short season at Berlin and a few performances at Vienna made it impossible. Rehearsals had been carried out assiduously, and the opera was almost ready for performance. The only other work of more than usual interest was 'Germania,' an opera composed some time before the war and performed only twice, owing to national prejudices. It is by Franchetti, and deals with historic personages in Germany in the late 18th and early 19th century. The book, which is well written, is by Illica, and consists of a Prologue, two 'Quadri'—which may be taken to mean Acts—and an Epilogue.

In the smaller and more intimate Filodramatici, which stands beside La Scala, the Italian company of Comic and Lyric Opera has been giving some excellent productions of old operas. The company is under the direction of Marcello Govoni, an ex-tenor of note, who has got together one of the most efficient companies one could wish for. Its répertoire is extraordinary. The operas it has done here up to the present are: 'La Cenerentola' ('Cinderella'), of Rossini, 'Don Pasquale,' 'L'elisir d'amore,' 'The Barber of Seville,' the Ricci brothers' 'Comare di Crespino,' Mascagni's 'L'amico Fritz,' and, too late for this month's notes, a novelty by Guido Farina, 'La Dodicesima Notte o Come lo Volete.' Long live Shakespeare! Including this—'Twelfth Night'—and last year's 'Sly,' the number of operas taken from him is very considerable. But why are they, almost without exception, Italian operas?

The pick of the operas at the Filodramatici was really 'Don Pasquale,' with 'La Cenerentola' very close. Both are extremely amusing and musically very graceful. In the former, Donizetti is at his very best; the latter, composed in some twenty-four days, when Rossini was only twenty-five, is sparkling and inspired, but still a minor work. It is, of course, in the form common to its period, recitativo secco and aria, &c.

The musical directors, Annovazzi and Mugnai, are both still youthful. Both are enthusiastic, and, besides being efficient, are artists. Of the singers (all splendid actors) principal mention must be made of the comic bass, Paterna; a baritone named Lombardo; a most charming soprano, De Ferrari; and the tenor, Franco Perulli. The last-named has, in addition to perfect diction, a management of the voice that is nothing short of amazing.

'The Caliph's Hunchback,' an opera by Franco Cavasola that was awarded one of the numerous prizes offered for works of a specified nature and length, was performed at Rome with exceptional success, according to the reports. The story is from the 'Thousand and One Nights.' If the enthusiasm with which the Rome public listened to the little work was the result of merit, it will undoubtedly become popular.

CHARLES D'IF.

NEW YORK

It is in the nature of things, I suppose, that musical activity should be no exception to the law according to which all things move in cycles. But the end of the musical season here always comes with something of a jar. America, and particularly New York, during the winter months is doubtless an increasingly musical nation. But with the first of May comes a noticeable weakening of the musical pulse, and by the middle or the end of the month the last rites will have been performed and Music-in-Public will have been buried out of sight and out of mind.

Neither Paris nor Berlin boasts a greater quantity of public music-making than New York from October through April; and Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, Cleveland, Detroit, and San Francisco do not fall far behind their European counterparts. But to observe the falling off of interest in music with the approach of summer is to gain the impression that Main Street (and 57th Street as well) find something almost indecent in musical performance when the mercury rises above 60 degrees Fahrenheit.

The Muse herself, it seems, and all her suite, book annual passage to Cherbourg for May 15. Dutifully, and therefore ostentatiously, psalms are intoned in praise of the departed guest. For a frenzied two or three weeks there are music festivals throughout the land, with the aid of such imported talent as has been persuaded to tarry for the occasions; or, in its absence, with the native talent that comes more and more to fall into the category of protected products of infant industries. This is not to say that some of the festivals are not of musical importance. On the contrary, the spring festival of the Bethlehem (Pennsylvania) Bach Choir, for example, is one of the outstanding musical events of the season. But they do range all the way from the excellent to the terrible, and at their worst are less a musical event than a publicity device to boom the cities in which they are held.

There is also a nationally organized Music Week, with all sorts of contests for children and young people. Prizes are awarded to soloists or organizations of exceptional promise, and there are 'Music Memory Contests' in the schools, at which the children compete for the honour of remembering the greatest number of chestnuts by name. Unfortunately, the musical quality of the latter is often regrettably poor, and there is a tendency on the part of ambitious teachers to drill into the ears of their unfortunate pupils merely the opening measures of the pieces on the list from which the contest selections are drawn.

It is also the season for statistical analyses, and some of the figures made public in the last few weeks may be of interest.

At the Metropolitan Opera House, as was to be expected, 'Aida' was performed more often than any other work—eight times—and out of a total of a hundred and eighty-six performances ninety-five were devoted to Italian operas. 'Jonny spielt auf' was the only one of the novelties to attain any conspicuous popularity, having been performed seven times—a record equalled only by 'Tosca' and 'Cavalleria Rusticana.'

There were three other novelties—'The Egyptian Helen,' of Richard Strauss, 'The Sunken Bell,' of Respighi, and Pizzetti's 'Fra Gherardo.'

The significance of figures becomes more striking when one looks at the statistical summary of the first season of the Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. New York has now only one resident conducted orchestra. (There is also a fairly successful 'conductorless ensemble.') The Philharmonic Society this year absorbed the former New York Symphony Society, due to the fact that the Mæcenas of the latter organization tired of his rôle.

But do not think that we lack variety in conductors on that account. Far from it—much too far from it. Our one conducted orchestra played this year under no less than ten conductors: Mengelberg, Toscanini, Damrosch, Schelling, Gabrilowitsch, Honegger, Krauss, Molinari, Reiner, and Hans Lange. (The latter is a violinist in the orchestra, and is by no means the least gifted conductor in the list.)

The evils of 'guest conducting' have beset the Philadelphia Orchestra no less, and it is more or less generally conceded that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, where Kussewitzky conducts all season long, is fast superseding the Philadelphia organization as America's leading orchestra.

Partially to atone for his prolonged absences, perhaps, Mr. Stokowski recently conducted in New York the first stage performance in this country of Stravinsky's 'Les Noces,' presented under the auspices of the League of Composers. During the same week, Sokoloff brought his Cleveland Orchestra to New York for some mimed performances, including Debussy's Nocturnes, Strauss's 'Ein Heldenleben,' Bloch's 'Israel' Symphony, the Polovetzki Dances from Borodin's 'Prince Igor,' Griffe's 'White Peacock,' and Enesco's first Roumanian Rhapsody. There seems to be general agreement among critics and musicians that it is about as hard to try to mime clouds as to impersonate a hero's critics. Where music has not been especially written to be mimed there is always the question to what extent the miming and the music shall be rhythmically co-ordinated—a problem which seems not to have been noticeably advanced towards solution in this instance.

Having waited long and impatiently for a final recital by Myra Hess, and learning that she was to give no more at New York this season, I took advantage of a warm spring day recently to go up the Hudson to the village of Millbrook, near Poughkeepsie, N.Y., where she played in the auditorium of a private school for girls. During most of the recital she seemed to me greater than she has ever been. But, apparently owing to fatigue, she lost something of her spontaneity towards the end, and in the last group seemed almost to be playing against time. It was the first time I had ever heard her give a routine performance, and the experience brought me distinct relief, as I had begun to wonder whether my admiration for her had entirely destroyed all critical balance. I am glad to know that when she does play merely very well I am aware of the fact, for it makes me surer than ever that her greatest playing is just as incredibly pure music as it sounds. At her greatest she is to me uniquely moving, because, I suppose, she seems more completely than anyone else I know to disappear from between the music and the hearer.

The experience is of interest to others than myself only because of what followed. This mood of fatigue seemed to last almost throughout the final group and the encores. She concluded with the Gigue from the G major 'French' Suite of Bach, and it, too, bounced rather less spontaneously than she usually lets it. But as she came to the final statement of the inverted subject, in the bass, she seemed by conscious effort of will to shake off her fatigue entirely, so that in the space of three or four measures she completely recovered her joie de jouer. I have never seen so striking a demonstration of the control it is possible to exercise over great genius.

I learn that Dusolina Giannini has had to cancel her engagement at Covent Garden because of the lateness of the Italian repertory there, and owing to the necessity of starting her Australian tour a month earlier than she had originally intended. She is to sail from Vancouver on May 29, making her debut in Sydney Town Hall one month later.

ARTHUR MENDEL.

TORONTO

April was a quiet but unusually interesting month. Chorally, a long-entertained ambition has been realised in the first performance in its entirety of the great B minor Mass, on the occasion of the dedication of a stained-glass window in St. Paul's Church to the memory of Dr. A. S. Vogt, founder of the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir. Dr. Fricker and the Choir had associated with them for this event many of the leading city musicians, notably Mr. T. J. Crawford at the organ, and Mr. Boris Hambourg and Mr. Leo Smith in the orchestra. The soloists, unfortunately not of this city, were Miss Leanette Vreeland, soprano, Miss Mabel Beddoe, contralto, Mr. Tudor Davies, tenor, and Dr. Charles T. Tiltman, bass. The critics were deeply impressed, as were two large congregations assembled in the church on succeeding nights; and as the event was broadcast, more Canadians were enabled to hear their great Choir at one time than ever before.

Conservatory opera this year saw the presentation of Purcell's 'Dido and Æneas,' Bach's 'Peasant' Cantata, and Suppé's 'Boccaccio,' under the direction of Dr. Ernest MacMillan and Mr. T. J. Crawford.

Visiting us came an English company in 'The Beggar's Opera,' as fresh and enchanting as ever, with Miss Sylvia Nelis and Mr. Alfred Heather in top form, and, later, the D'Oyly Carte Company on its way back to England. As before, its reception was a phenomenal one of packed house after packed house throughout the entire three weeks. 'The Mikado,' 'The Gondoliers,' 'Trial by Jury,' 'The Pirates of Penzance,' and 'Ruddigore' were given.

A very brilliant affair was the first appearance here of the Royal Belgian Guard Symphonic Band, under Capt. Arthur Provost, especially in the revelation of pure tone-quality, above all, perhaps, in the wood-wind section. The programme was splendidly chosen—Bach, Weber, Wagner, and Tchaikovsky.

It is many years since Harold Bauer came to Toronto, and just as many years since we have heard such sheer beauty of execution and inspiration as this great artist showed in a perfectly balanced programme of Bach, Schumann, César Franck, Ravel, Brahms, Schubert, and Chopin.

VIENNA

OPERA

As the last of a very short series of novelties for the current season, the Staatsoper brought out Maurice Ravel's opera 'L'enfant et les sortilèges.' The denomination of 'opera' is probably applied here with some deviation from correctness. This charming little work is indeed a unique blend of opera, ballet, and fairy-tale, and it is this mixture, with a predominance of the last-named species, that makes it so attractive. Its shortcoming—surely an intentional one—is the absence of dramatic cohesion. Colette, the librettist, and Ravel, the composer, give a series of light, fleeting visions painted in delicate water-colours. And a precious canvas it is, with vivid figures: the charming fox-trot dialogue between a Wedgwood Tea-cup, gifted with a decided English accent, and a Chinese Tea-pot possessed of an astounding knowledge of the five-tone scale; the dancing and coloratura-singing Hearth-Flame (a stepsister of Wagner's Loge), who dies with a gasp under the fatal embrace of sombre

Ashes; the love-scene between Tom-cat and Cat beneath a broadly-smiling moon—'cat music' of the most amusing and cultured sort; the Biedermeier dance of the Easy Chair to the appropriate accompaniment of a cembalo; the singing and hopping Frogs; the Nightingale who vies with memories of Jenny Lind's fluent coloratura; and all the wealth of dead and living things brought to stage life by the fancy of a gifted poet and a poetic composer—a big, small world, seen through the eyes of a child; a French child, to be sure, and decidedly one of the 20th century.

The Staatsoper attached beautiful scenic art to this long-postponed production. Robert Heger gave a sparkling and delicate orchestral reading, Lothar Wallerstein's stage direction was deft and amusing, and Eugen Steinhoff's stage settings for the most part happy and imaginative. For the rôle of the small boy, two young singers were brought from the class-room of the Vienna State Conservatory straight to the awe-inspiring stage of our Opera. A daring experiment, but both Miss Widl and Miss Fuchs, who alternate in the part, justified the courage of the directorate by their vocal gifts and histrionic talents. From the big number of soloists, the sprightly soprano Adele Kern—in the double rôle of Fire and the Princess—deserves special mention.

Hans Pfitzner's sixtieth birthday was observed by the Staatsoper with revivals of his two most important operatic works, 'Die Rose vom Liebesgarten'—that strange and by now somewhat obsolete pot-pourri of dramatic and musical elements from 'Parsifal' and the 'Ring'—and 'Palestrina.' Pfitzner, 'last romantic' and perhaps sole surviving upholder of the Wagnerian ideal in our day, was present to direct his operas, and was much fêted on his day of honour. This militant fighter against modernism both in deed and writing, determinedly sheds around himself an atmosphere of old lavender. Yet Pfitzner is perhaps more modern than he himself realises in a work like 'Palestrina.' It may or may not live; surely future generations will regard it as a document of German idealism at its best; and the second Act, with its gigantic and dramatically impressive vision of the Tridentine council, will survive as symbol of a towering theatrical achievement to equal Wagner's huge stage conceptions.

At the Neues Wiener Stadt-theater an operatic company from the Slovak National Theatre at Bratislava (Czecho-Slovakia) is giving a series of guest performances in the Czech language. Oscar Nedbal is the director and first conductor, and his nephew, Karel Nedbal, the assistant-conductor of the company. The répertoire includes many works which are virtually unknown, and others that are hardly ever performed: several operas of Smetana's, among them 'Lubussa'; Fibich's 'The Bride of Messina'; Foerster's 'Eva'; Novak's 'The Lantern'; a complete cycle of Dvorák's operas—all newly staged to commemorate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the composer's death; Russian operas, among them 'Tsar Saltan,' by Rimsky-Korsakov; Strauss's 'Elektra'; Mozart operas; and, as a curiosity, an operatic setting of Richard Wagner's libretto for 'Wieland der Schmied,' by Leoslav Bella, a Slovak composer. All these works are splendidly presented with good, often excellent, singers, and in settings which are rarely lavish but always original and interesting. Bratislava, let us add, is a city of about forty thousand inhabitants!

MODERN MUSIC

With the Austrian branch of the I.S.C.M. all but defunct this season (owing to that traditional and chronic disease of modern music societies, lack of funds), the promotion of contemporary music rests entirely upon private enterprise—which, when translated into plain English (or indeed German, or French, or Italian) indicates that modern music is hardly at all performed. The famous concert artists—conductors, instrumentalists, and singers—prefer to rely on familiar, accepted, and well-tried music, rather than to burden their popularity with the task of advocating problematic new works. Few of them—and mostly the younger ones—muster the courage to embrace the cause of the young composer. Friedrich Wührer, the young Viennese pianist, is one of these exceptions; Eduard Steuermann, his pianistic colleague, another. Two excellent pianists both, but completely differing types; Wührer is the 'Musikant,' Steuermann the 'thinking pianist.' Among the Viennese chamber-music organizations, the Kolisch Quartet (Viennese String Quartet) alone expounds the cause of extreme modernism as embodied in Schönberg or Bartók. The Sedlak-Winkler Quartet propagate contemporary music minus the 'modernistic' ingredient. Wilhelm Kienzl's new Quartet was among their recent offerings: pleasing, melodious, but not radical in any sense—and who would expect that of the composer, now in his 'seventies, who wrote 'Der Evangelimann' several decades ago? And who would not concede Arnold Rosé and his Quartet members, veteran apostles of Schönberg twenty and more years ago, the right to rest on well-deserved laurels of classicism?

Paul A. Pisk, in a composition concert, gave a fairly complete survey of his recent production: pianoforte compositions, songs, and a Violin Sonata. The last-named piece in particular indicated a briskness and vividness hardly before known in this often esoteric composer. It is modern music, yet the sort to reach heart and ear of broader circles as well, surprising and appealing in its virility and spontaneity. The presence of Maurice Ravel at Vienna was the welcome occasion for a chamber music concert of his compositions. Ruzena Herlinger, courageous propagandist for modern music, was among the interpreters, also Friedrich Wührer and Jella Braun-Fernwald, the eminently musical contralto.

RECITALISTS

The number of recital artists who would deserve extensive mention has been very large this season. In recording them your correspondent must need resort to the principle of the 'survival of the fittest.' Among the pianists, Wladimir Horowitz was a new-comer, and achieved a signal success. Very deep was the impression created by Stephan Askenase, one of the youngest but surely one of the most interesting of our pianists; after a rather long interval, a re-hearing proved his extraordinary growth in the direction of musical depth and insight. Ania Dorfmann, a Russian pianist resident at Paris, gives her finest in music of Mozart and Schubert; few pianists have her subtlety and tender lyric expression for this music. Judith Bokor, ever a welcome visitor, is one of the few artists to-day who are able to overcome that 'sombreness' associated with the 'cello; the instrument 'sings' under her hands. Gregor Piatigorsky, new to Vienna, was at once acclaimed as one of the great 'cellists of the period.

MAINLY BRITISH SOLOISTS

Very great has been the number of British artists to be heard at Vienna this season. Let us group them according to their instruments, without any attempt to classify them according to quality. Myra Hess and Katharine Goodson are too well known in England and elsewhere to call for further praise. Miss Goodson was the soloist chosen for the Schubert festival of the Workers' Concerts, and gave a powerful reading of the 'Wanderer Fantasia.' Edith Walton appeared most successfully with orchestra, under the baton of Jacques van Lier—who was also heard as a 'cellist in a joint recital and proved as fine an artist as he was before he left Central Europe to make his residence in England. Harriet Cohen, previously heard in recitals here, gave a beautiful reading of the pianoforte part in de Falla's 'Night in a Spanish Garden,' under Hans Knappertsbusch's baton. Nora Drewett de Kresz, long acknowledged here as a great pianist, was heard in a perfect performance of Chopin's F minor Concerto (and her husband, Géza de Kresz, won approval and applause with Brahms's Concerto and Ravel's 'La Tzigane'). Anton Maaskoff's noble and impeccable playing created an excellent impression at his violin recital. Adila Fachiri, often heard here before, has never been heard to better advantage; with two concerts she has now firmly established herself at Vienna. Peggy Thomson sang an attractive programme with much success. Jessie King, an Australian contralto, exhibited a beautiful voice and was at her best in lyric numbers. Jessie MacLennan, a Scotch singer, is a most musical and tasteful soprano; she had the assistance of Jacques van Lier as conductor. Malcolm Davidson, the baritone, is a singer and a musician; his programme was unusually interesting and well compiled, and was interpreted in splendid style. Paul Bechert.

Obituary

We regret to record the following deaths:

Antonio Smareglia, at Grado, in Istria, a few weeks ago. Of all the musicians who just fail to secure lasting fame as composers no one came nearer to success than Smareglia. Born at Pola, in May, 1854, Smareglia did not show those early signs of talent which win the heart of parents and guardians and reconcile them to the idea of a musical career for those under their tutelage. But when he was sent to study mathematics at the Vienna Polytechnic the desire, the need to follow a very different career, became imperative, and in 1872 he entered the Conservatorio of Milan as a student of composition under Franco Faccio. He was still a student when the first performance of 'Lohengrin' threw the Milanese into two camps, for and against Wagner. Smareglia, who already shared Boïto's cult for Bach, became one of the most ardent apostles of the Wagnerian party. Nevertheless, when he was asked to complete an opera which Donizetti had left unfinished he did so, adding a Prelude which, praised and applauded at first, failed to interest as soon as it became known that it was not the work of Donizetti. After a stay of fifteen years at Milan, Smareglia turned to Vienna, where a new opera of his, 'Il Vassallo di Szigeth,' was received with great enthusiasm. The conductor of the opera, Jahn, turned to him at the conclusion of the performance, and said, 'This success means world-wide fame for you.' The opera was performed again at the Metropolitan in New York, and kept its place in the Viennese repertory for some time, but Jahn's prophecy was not fulfilled. Neither this nor 'Cornelio Schutt,' which Richter conducted for the first time at Vienna, secured the favour of the wide public. Yet Richter thought so highly of the work that years later, at Manchester, he declared Smareglia the best of the Italian composers of the day. 'Nozze Istriane,' perhaps his best work, 'La Falena,' and 'Oceana' won the approval of distinguished experts like Toscanini, Boïto, and Franchetti, but not the approval of the mass of amateurs whose support is essential before a good work becomes a profitable one. Curiously, amongst Smareglia's warmest admirers was Franz Lehar, the composer of 'The Merry Widow.' In 1876 Smareglia, whose eyes had always been weak, became totally blind, and his last scores, 'Oceana' and 'Abisso,' were dictated to his son and his pupils, bar by bar. This fact alone is enough to show the extent of his musicianship and the powers of his memory. What special gift was denied to him who, with such sterling qualities, yet failed to win the recognition less able men have won? It is not easy to answer that question. He was unworldly, and some of his friends found him at times exasperatingly unpractical. But this fact alone does not account for it. Perhaps his music, ever original and masterly in construction, lacks a little of the poetry and idealism which appeals to the masses. Perhaps his unbounded admiration for Wagner reacted adversely on his work, which recalls indirectly the technique of the great German. In any case, Smareglia remains one whom the art he most loved has treated most harshly, and Mr. Blom may well consider the advisability of adding him to the next issue of the 'Stepchildren of Music.'

Lionel Seymour Benson, at Whinfold, Hascombe, in his eighty-first year. He was one of the most distinguished amateurs of his generation, his chief claim on the gratitude of musicians being the great services he rendered to choral music as director of the Magpie Madrigal Society. This body was started originally for the performance of plantation songs by the late Sir Alfred Scott-Gatty, but under Benson's direction it was quickly converted into a choir for the exclusive practice and performance of the best unaccompanied choral music of all ages and schools. For the use of the choir Benson unearthed, edited, and published a great many madrigals of the 16th and 17th centuries; and many of the finest part-songs of Parry and Stanford had their first hearing at the Magpie Concerts. The Society was disbanded in 1911, and a souvenir issued at that time contained a repertory of the choir that was a really wonderful record. Benson was for over thirty years, and up to the date of his death, a member of the Council of the Royal College of Music, and he was always on close terms of friendship with such musicians as Parry, Stanford, and Sir Hugh Allen. He was an excellent actor as well as singer, and a great cricket enthusiast. Probably his most permanent memorial will be the numerous madrigals and part-songs bearing his name as editor, or dedicated to him and his choir.

Lilli Lehmann, at Berlin, on May 17, aged eighty-one. She was born on May 15, 1848, at Würzburg, and received her first singing-lesson from her mother, Marie Lehmann, who had been a prima donna and a harp player at Cassel, under Spohr, and had created some of the chief parts in the operas of that composer. Lilli Lehmann's debut was made at Prague, in 'The Magic Flute.' At Berlin she made her first appearance as Vielka in Meyerbeer's 'Ein Feldlager in Schlesien,' in 1870, with such success that she remained at Berlin until 1885. In London she made her debut at Her Majesty's Theatre as Violetta, in 1880, singing there for two seasons. At Covent Garden she appeared in German opera in 1884. For the next four seasons she sang in German opera in America, returning to Her Majesty's Theatre in 1887, when she sang Fidelio to the Florestan of her husband, Herr Kalisch. She returned to Germany in 1890, singing much in opera and concert, and in 1899 made a reappearance at Covent Garden as Fidelio, Sieglinde, Norma, Isolde, Donna Anna, and Ortrud. She was far more than a fine singer, being an accomplished musician and actress. At the end of her active career she settled down to teach in a suburb of Berlin. She maintained till the end, despite the strain of the war, warm feelings of friendship towards this country.

William Bertram Collingwood, at Grahamstown, South Africa, on March 8. A native of Chesterfield, where he was born in 1878, he displayed early signs of unusual musical ability. At fourteen years of age he became organist at Abingdon, where he was at school, and where his musical teacher was Dr. Iliffe. At nineteen he gained a scholarship at Pembroke College, Oxford, and two years later a musical exhibition at Jesus College. In 1902 he was appointed music master at St. Edmund's, Canterbury. Four years later he went to South Africa, to take an organ post at Queenstown. He held this for thirteen years, and was then appointed to Kimberley Cathedral. For reasons of health he resigned that post, and took up a similar position at Commemoration Church, Grahamstown. In 1923 he inaugurated the music department at Rhodes University, and did much to place the art on a proper footing in the University Calendar. Last year the University Senate at Pretoria made him chairman of the musical section for South Africa. He held the degree of M.A. (Oxon.). An accomplished all-round musician, his sudden death in the prime of life is a great loss to music in South Africa.

Mark James Monk, on May 5, at Blackheath. He was born at Hunmanby, Yorkshire, in 1858, and graduated Mus. Doc. (Oxon.) thirty years later. He was organist at Truro Cathedral from 1889 to 1919.

ADOLF WEISSMANN, suddenly, at Haifa, Palestine, on April 23. (He had lectured on the previous Sunday at the Hebrew University at Jerusalem.) Dr. Weissmann was one of the most esteemed of Germany's musical critics. The width of his views was revealed in his book 'The Problems of Modern Music,' which appeared in an English version about three years ago. For some years past he has acted as the Musical Times representative at Berlin.

MRS. DILLON (née Beatrice M. Porter), on May 13, at Southend-on-Sea, aged fifty-six. She was for many years harpist to the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company, and also at His Majesty's Theatre, London.

WILLIAM ALFRED FROST, on Whit-Sunday, in London, aged seventy-eight. For many years he was vicar-choral at St. Paul's Cathedral.

FRANK ADLAM, in London, organist and composer, aged seventy-one.

It is good news that the Albert Hall scenic performance of 'Hiawatha,' which was so successful last year, is to be repeated on June 10-24. The Royal Choral Society will again provide the chorus, the orchestra will be the New Symphony, a strong cast of soloists is announced, and Dr. Malcolm Sargent will conduct.

Technique AND Expression

In Pianoforte Playing

By FRANKLIN TAYLOR

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express myself more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

"JUDITH"

An Opera in one Act

Libretto by
ARNOLD BENNETT

Music by
EUGENE GOOSSENS

TO BE PRODUCED AT

Covent Garden Opera House

IN JUNE, 1929

THE production of an English Opera, in English, during the Grand Season at Covent Garden is an almost unheard-of event, and would in any case create a sensation. But this first performance of "JUDITH" will be especially significant because it is the product, not only of one of the most distinguished living British composers, but of his collaboration with a great English man of letters. Mr. Arnold Bennett's libretto would alone attract serious attention.

It is a remarkably powerful piece of work, admirably adapted to musical treatment by its swiftness of action and directness of expression; moreover, it is one of those rare instances in opera where poet & composer match each other.

The Music is unquestionably the strongest and most striking piece of work yet written by Eugène Goossens, and it will reveal an entirely new side of the composer's personality.

PIANO PEDALS, with Octave Coupler

This wonderful invention supersedes all Piano Pedals, and is a Master Patent.

St. George's Hall, Liverpool,
9th April, 1921.

"The simplicity of the attachment, and the clever sixteen-feet, eight-feet, or both combined, 'OPTIONAL OCTAVE' contrivance astonished me.

"I was delighted with the Pedal touch and with the variety in that touch, which your Attachment makes possible. It is very responsive to the movements of the feet, and is reliable."

HERBERT F. ELLINGFORD, Mus. Bac., Oxon., F.R.C.O.

Owing to increased output, we have reduced the price of our Popular Model to 14 guineas cash. Deferred payments if desired.

STUDENTS IN COMPOSITION

L.R.A.M.—"I owe you a great debt of gratitude for your great help."

Student at University (after 1st Course).—"I should like to thank you for your splendid tuition in Harmony and Composition. It has been of inestimable value. The comments and explanations have proved invaluable."

Student in Composition.—"You have changed my whole outlook as regards composition."

L.R.A.M. and Composition.—"I can see the masterful touches, and there are touches of great beauty in your alterations. All you have done for me in composition is scholarly."

Student in Modern Composition.—"I entirely agree with your exhortation and philosophy in the evolution of one's powers."

L.R.A.M., F.R.C.O., A.R.C.M., &c. (after 4th Lesson).—"I am glad to say that already I am able to do quicker and better Composition, due to your tuition and encouragement."

Orchestration.—"The orchestration you have written for me is really very fine. Your style is modern, and always interesting."

Song Accompaniments.—"Needless to say I am more than pleased with your work. You have been of tremendous help to me. The last work you sent me (song accompaniment, modern idiom), is very effective indeed."

Course in Composition.—"Your courses in Composition come nearer to the Authentic thing, than anything I have been able to come across before."

in a forthcoming examination for any Certificate or Diploma? Or are you, purely as a student, struggling to DEVELOP THE SENSE OF MENTAL HEARING ?

It is impossible to cope with the present standard of Aural Tests without daily practice, and hitherto this has been impossible without the co-operation of a musician who can play the kind of test required—a facility out of reach of nine students out of ten.

BUT THE "AUROLA"
PLAYS TESTS AUTOMATICALLY

Small, inexpensive, easily operated by a non-musical person, or by the student himself—anywhere, and at any time—independently of any other instrument; the AUROLA

"Gives out" every type of Aural Test

(Chords, Rhythms, Melodies, Cadences, Contrapuntal Progressions, &c.), of Any Grade, and in Unlimited Variety. Any test, or part of a test, can be repeated; the speed can be varied ad lib., and results checked step by step.

"Finger Magic"

HOW THE MASTER MUSICIAN IS MADE.

"I have been reading a little booklet which I have termed 'Finger Magic,' and I would very much like to place this book in the hands of every pianist, violinist, and 'cellist in the Kingdom.

"We all know that the secret of the virtuosi does not consist in the amount of time they expend in instrumental practice—one recently stated that he often does not touch the instrument for a week, and another has affirmed that musicians are positively superstitious about practice. The secret of the success of the great masters must therefore be looked for in another direction than in the capacity for hard grinding practice on orthodox lines, and I have been experimenting with a system which may well prove to be a solution, or at any rate to a large extent.

"The system to which I refer develops the hands not by practice in the ordinary sense, but by a series of exercises, based on sound psychological as well as physiological laws; the almost immediate effect of which is to increase the stretching capacity of the hand, and the descriptive booklet, issued by the Cowling Institute, contains some astonishing letters from musicians which would convince me, even if not backed up by my own experience, that the quickest and easiest way to develop the strength and flexibility of the wrist and fingers so essential to pianists, violinists, and 'cellists is to perform the operation away from the instrument, when the mind can be centred upon that object alone.

"I anticipate that within a measurable period the knowledge contained in this little booklet, and in the lessons given by the Cowling Institute, will form part of the curriculum of every teacher and be a necessary equipment of every violinist, 'cellist, and pianist."—

ERNEST JAY, F.R.C.O.

NOTE.—The booklet referred to above may be obtained free of all cost on application to Secretary, T., Cowling Institute, 71, Albion House, New Oxford Street, London, W.C.1. (State if a teacher.)

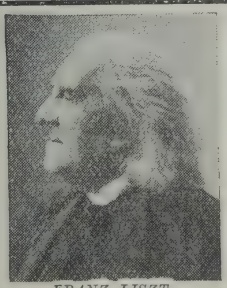
A really Good Pianist

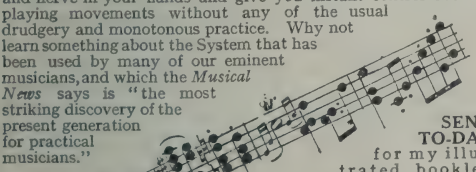
cannot be made by orthodox methods unless a special and rare gift exists already.



FRANZ LISZT

It has been pointed out with considerable show of reason that the real way to attain mastery over difficult passages is not to go over them until you are sick and tired of them, but to get your arm and hand muscles into the best state possible, a state approaching that exceptional muscular development with which virtuosi are endowed by Nature.

Let the "From Brain to Keyboard" System perfect every muscle and nerve in your hands and give you instant control over all playing movements without any of the usual drudgery and monotonous practice. Why not learn something about the System that has been used by many of our eminent musicians, and which the Musical News says is "the most striking discovery of the present generation for practical musicians."



SEND TO-DAY for my illustrated booklet, "Light on Pianoforte Playing." It explains my System fully, and gives details of fees and postal lessons. When writing please say whether you are an AVERAGE or ADVANCED PLAYER.

The booklet will be sent post free from

HARRIET COHEN

INTERVIEWED BY CLAUDIA SHEALE

'How did I begin to play the pianoforte?' said Miss Cohen in reply to my natural opening question. 'Well, I think I was born with the desire to play. You see, both my parents were musical. My mother was a pupil of Tobias Matthay, and my father writes orchestral and military band music. It was he who first taught me to write an orchestral score. One of my first musical recollections is that of sitting on Paderewski's knee in the artists' room of Queen's Hall at the age of six. I fear, however, that I did not then fully appreciate the honour of it!

'At the age of twelve I was fortunate enough to win an Ada Lewis Scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music. Shortly afterwards I left school, and began studying at the Academy. Then came my start as a teacher. Some of my pupils managed to win scholarships themselves, and success of this kind soon caused my name to be known. I have had pupils from as far away as Africa, Australia, and New Zealand. But it was hard work, and I much preferred playing myself. Besides all this, I had to go on practising and studying harmony, counterpoint, and scoring. I love anything to do with music, however, and soon began to amass books on that and, in fact, any other subject. Look at my library now.' She swept an expressive hand round the cosy study, towards the shelves filled with volumes ranging from Thackeray and Dostoievsky to H. G. Wells, Arnold Bennett, and Ernest Newman.

'Many of them are autographed copies,' she said. 'I have learnt a tremendous amount from books and travel.'

'Do you go out much?'

'No,' replied Miss Cohen. 'Occasionally I dance, but I hardly ever visit a theatre. One simply hasn't the time to do everything. And I do not think the public realise how hard artists have to work in order to keep up a reputation. For example, I practise for seven or eight hours a day whenever possible.

'By the way,' she added, 'I started with a serious natural handicap. I remember that when I met Busoni he looked at my hands and said they were the worst and smallest pianoforte hands he had ever seen. In fact, he advised me to give up music!'

It should be added that on hearing and seeing what those hands could do, he withdrew his advice.

I asked Miss Cohen as to the circumstances of her debut. 'My first concert appearance,' she said, 'was at a Chappell Sunday Evening Concert at Queen's Hall, when I was thirteen. I did not follow it up, however, as it was not considered advisable to exploit me as a prodigy.' One of her great successes was in 1926, when she played at Sir Henry Wood's first Bach concert, her companion soloist being Jelly d'Aranyi.

Miss Cohen's present popularity on the Continent is largely due to her great success in Bach concerts in Holland, Vienna, and Berlin, Herr Adolf Weissmann having said that Miss Cohen has few, if any, equals as a Bach player. She also played at the Salzburg Festival in 1924, joining Beatrice Harrison in Ireland's 'Cello Sonata and Lionel Tertis in Bax's Sonata for viola. In 1924 she made her Berlin debut, and now plays there annually. She told me that during her visit to Berlin recently she met Einstein.

'I had been informed,' she said, 'that he rarely spared visitors more than about ten minutes. I found he was a great Bach enthusiast, so I played to him for some time, and we discussed various aspects of music. Einstein, by the way, is an excellent violinist, his favourite composers being Bach and Mozart. We had a long chat about Bach, and when we meet again we shall do some Bach and Mozart violin and pianoforte sonatas together.'

'I understand, Miss Cohen,' I said, 'that you once played pianoforte duets with no less a person than Bernard Shaw. Is this so?'

'Yes,' she replied. 'We had a very energetic bout with four-handed arrangements of Beethoven and other symphonies. Mr. Shaw is a very capable pianist, by the way. At our first meeting he gave me a long lecture on Mozart and Wagner. An uncommonly good lecture it was, too—one of the best and most illuminating musical talks I have ever heard.'

We discussed Miss Cohen's Continental experiences. She has played recently at Vienna, Amsterdam, Leipsic, Rotterdam, Copenhagen, Warsaw, Geneva, Barcelona, Madrid, and Stockholm, thus covering a very considerable area of the map of Europe. At Vienna the audience was so insistent for encores that the lights had to be turned out, as the audience would not go away.

I asked Miss Cohen her views as to the future of the concert. Would it be very adversely affected by the much-talked-of mechanisation of music—the gramophone, wireless, pianola, and so forth?

'It is a difficult question,' she replied. 'So many of these developments are new that it is unwise to be dogmatic about them. My own feeling about it is that if these inventions supply a real need they can do nothing but good. On the other hand, if they simply go on by their own momentum as a department of commerce, they may be harmful. The danger is that music-making is liable to become too easy. We may get too much of it, and end by losing our zest and powers of appreciation. Even the best of things may be too plentiful. Take diamonds, for example. We know that they have to restrict the output from the diamond mines in order to keep up their value. Yet there can be no question that the broadcasting and recording of music are a tremendous boon. Only yesterday I received a letter from a man in South Africa about some gramophone records of mine he had been playing. He is quite cut off from every ordinary source of music. He cannot play himself, and he has no opportunity of attending concerts. He is therefore dependent on the gramophone, and his letter is quite a touching example of what records of good music can be to a lonely man far away from home and civilization.'

Discussing concerts further, Miss Cohen expressed the view that far too much interest is taken in the performer at the expense of the music.

'If my listeners are more concerned with me and my playing than they are with the music, then I feel that I have failed in just that degree. I am, in fact, a strong anti-virtuoso. There is too often a tendency for the performer to come between the hearer and the composer. Far too many artists think of their own personalities first, last, and all the time, and use the composer only as an indispensable stalking-horse. One cannot blame the public for walking into the trap, which would never have been set if such people were artists in the nobler sense of the word. It is these people who have raised an altar to the false god of showmanship in place of the true god of music. The ideal of the performer, as of all true artists, should be that of service to art. Their attitude to the music they perform should express itself as "Come and hear what beautiful music this is," and not "Come and hear what I can make of this."'

An advantage of wireless music, I suggested, is that, the performer being invisible, music has a better chance of being judged on its merits than is usually the case in the concert room. Miss Cohen agreed. 'Wireless is, I think, training up something like a new public,' she said, 'a public that will be less and less concerned with the appearance and personality of the performer, and more and more with the music.'

Miss Cohen's excellence as a Bach player has long been recognised. In this connection it was pleasant to hear her express warm admiration for the work of Harold Samuel. 'Mr. Samuel,' she said, 'has done a great work. He has enormously increased the public for Bach; he has emphasised the human side of Bach's music; and he is giving pianists of to-day a constant lesson on how Bach's clavier music should be played.'

Reverting to her touring experiences, Miss Cohen said: 'It is very pleasant to feel that I have a little group of friends in many Continental towns. I love visiting all the places where the great composers lived, and I hunt out all their attics and the taverns or great houses they frequented. Continental audiences, too, have always been very kind to me. I am a Londoner, though, and don't like being long absent from London audiences.'

'How do you manage about practising when engaged in a long tour?' I asked.

'Well,' replied Miss Cohen, 'I always have a pianoforte in my hotel suite, and once, when going to Warsaw, I had with me a dumb keyboard, which I borrowed from Irene Scharrer, and on which I practised in the train. It is all too easy for one's fingers to become stiff.'

'You must have had some amusing adventures abroad,' I remarked.

'Yes, on one occasion, in Paris, I was visiting a small out-of-the-way restaurant frequented by Russian refugee nobles, and was there recognised and asked to play. Having seated myself at the piano I found, to my dismay, it possessed no pedals! Most of the ivory was worn off the keys, the notes were tinny, and the whole thing had a decided list to starboard. However, I struggled manfully with Chopin, and judging by the applause, I had managed to make the best of a bad job.

'By the way, I shall never forget learning to drive my little car at Geneva. Drivers are pretty severely tested there, for the roads are so precipitous and full of hairpin bends. If you've ever seen one of these appalling Swiss roads you may get some idea of the difficulty of it!'

Before my departure Miss Cohen showed me some of her treasures. Amongst them are a number of snuff-boxes of all shapes, sizes, and periods, which she has collected. There are also a painting by Arnold Bennett, and a brooch of crystal and diamonds presented her by the Queen of Spain. In her visitors' book, Gershwin has written the first few bars of his 'Rhapsody in Blue.'

Her last word to me was an emphatic remark concerning the importance of hard work. 'Nothing can take its place,' she said. But she herself is the best evidence of the value of an exquisite touch and a keen sensibility.

IN MUTUAL CONTEMPT

By Rutland Boughton

(Concluded from June number, p. 499)

The routine of a musician's life from his student years to the time of his fullest maturity is spent developing and exhibiting the product of a small part of his capacity as a human being. We develop that part to some extent at the expense of more important mental powers; and those other mental powers are almost entirely ignored by the people who accept responsibility for our training—inevitably perhaps, for they were treated in the same way. And while essential parts of the minds of music students are ignored, their characters suffer in a disciplinary way, because the musical study in itself is not sufficient to keep them employed, except in a few extraordinary and fanatical cases.

Very well do I recall how easy it was to get through a week's work for my teachers at the Royal College of Music; it occupied not more than one or two days at the outside—composition, harmony, counterpoint, and a couple of hours daily at the pianoforte. There was no discipline to ensure that the greater part of the week was profitably spent; nor, except in the classes of Walford Davies, was there any conception of the extra-musical needs of the student mind. A few very ardent students spent their full time in additional musical exercises; some of them became neurotic and even stupid. The majority of the men spent much time in idling, philandering, with a little sport and some drinking. Many of the idlers subsequently became more distinguished than the swatters. (Things are sometimes learned accidentally by idlers.) And if their subsequent distinction has not always redounded to the credit of their musical taste, their present positions in the world do at least indicate a more general capacity than that possessed by the musical fanatics.

A study of the lives of great artists (and that study ought to form part of all training for artistic work) will cause us to realise that they were men who not only had the combination of natural capacity and industry which we call genius, but had minds developed in certain other directions—such development enabling them to place their art in real relation with the greater world.

Bach's manual skill in the construction of musical instruments, and his considerable theological studies, were activities quite distinct from his creative musicianship; but they, no less than his purely musical genius, entered into the final make-up of his work. Moreover, his capacity as a business man proclaimed him a practical realist. How many church organists are taught to build their instruments, or even to tune them? How many of them take the theological side of their work seriously enough to study it as an essential part of their training and life-work? Of that a little more presently.

Bach was not the only well-educated master of music; and by well-educated I need scarcely say that I am not referring to the expensiveness of a man's training, but to the reality and balance of it.

Beethoven was less a man of the world than Bach, but he also knew how to treat with his publishers in matters of business, though he hated the job. Writing to Hoffmeister, he said, 'I wish that if works of art ever bring profit that it might go to real artists instead of mere shopkeepers. . . . There ought to be only one art-warehouse in the world, to which an artist would only need to carry his art-works to take away with him whatever he needed. As it is, one must be half-tradesman.' But while he was capable of a realistic attitude in some practical matters, and capable of making such a prophetic suggestion as the above, there were other aspects of his mental activity (politics and metaphysics), even though his ideas were those of a recluse rather than of a man of action.

Wagner's range of interest is shown in his actual life, and the depth (though not always the clarity) of his mind in his prose writings. His practical nature was to some extent developed by the nature of theatrical activity. The other and greater part of his mind can be realised in the subject-matter of his librettos and the economic and philosophical conceptions which inform them. Shaw's 'Perfect Wagnerite,' though no infallible guide to 'The Ring of the Nibelung,' gives a better idea of Wagner's mental quality than any of the recognised studies and biographies.

Those three masters have been the outstanding musical figures of our civilization. They each had the metaphysical bias which seems to be an inevitable concomitant of the musical mind; but they were all realists as well. Mozart, and even Mendelssohn and Chopin, were in some technical details superior to Beethoven and Wagner. The greater artists attained to greater influence and power because of the extra-musical elements which were incorporated with their work.

So it would seem that if the study of music is to be pursued as a special craft, and yet produce musicians who are of balanced mind, such study should be supplemented with some kind of materially productive labour involving manual skill (farming, weaving, smithery, &c.), and be associated with a broad study of world forces (history, economics, religion, science, &c.). It may be argued that some of these already have their part in a university training; to which it may be promptly answered that the majority of distinguished students at our schools of music—judging by the scholarship lists—are not of the university sort.

The most all-round students are probably those who train for positions as church organists, but even they seem little interested in, or even acquainted with, the psychology and history of religions. The most mentally alert church organist I have known intimately, regarded as a godsend (his own word) certain interests which were in direct opposition to orthodox theology. He finally disengaged himself from regular church work.

Some years ago I expressed in a lecture a severe criticism of modern Church music, and suggested that its quality was an indication of the nature of the emotions which it proposed to serve and express. The criticism drew a gentle and pathetic note of acquiescence from the late

Canon Gorton, a pioneer in what is perhaps the most living musical movement in England—the Competition Festivals. What is wrong with Anglican music is a sign of what is wrong with the Protestant Churches of to-day—they are out of touch with all reality. This criticism is not true to the same extent of the Roman Church, because its teachings have always had a more direct relation with the real world. I am no Catholic, and even believe that the Roman Church is the most effective organized enemy of mental freedom; but it seems to me of no little significance that our leading composer belongs to the Roman Church, while a Catholic tendency is very clear in the works of Walford Davies and Vaughan Williams. Even Ethel Smyth has balanced her philosophical anarchism with a splendidly rampant Mass!

Why should this reaction towards Roman emotions have been evident throughout the Protestant period among musicians of all kinds, with Lutheran Bach and free-thinking Beethoven to lead? Is it not because of that closer contact with reality, as distinct from doctrine, to which I have already referred?

That contact enables musicians to link up their craft with a greater force than one of mere personal fancy. The only alternatives are the stultifying theory of art for art's sake, or the expression of real creative forces as they prove themselves outside all Churches.

We have already seen to what kind of mutual contempt artists descend when they have no relation with the real world. That mutual feeling is nothing to the contempt which is felt for them by men of the world and men of wisdom. Read this, for example, from 'The Dance of Life,' by Havelock Ellis:

> 'Let us see what life is like as people have lived it. This is the more necessary to do since, to-day at all events, there are simple-minded people—well-meaning, honest people whom we should not ignore—who pooh-pooh such an idea. They point to the eccentric individuals in our Western civilization who make a little idol they call "Art," and fall down and worship it, sing incomprehensible chants in its honour, and spend most of their time in pouring contempt on the people who refuse to recognise that "Art" is the one thing needed for what they may or may not call the "moral uplift" of the age they live in. We must avoid the error of the good, simple-minded folk in whose eyes these "Arty" people loom so large. They are not large, they are merely the morbid symptoms of a social disease; they are the fantastic reaction of a society which as a whole has ceased to move along the true course of any real and living art.'

Art as an end in itself is either childish toy-play or a path to the pit. Artists can save themselves and their work only by regarding it as an integral part of the general mental life, for all to share in the measure of their capacity.

Music can be related to the real world, and will serve a vital function according to the skill of the craftsmen employed upon it. Or musicians can spin webs of their own in odd corners, and presently be swept away by the broom of those who want the real world, and a better world than now exists, cluttered up as it is with all sorts of bad things, not the least bad being meaningless art-works made by men who hold each other in stupid contempt.

RHYTHM, IN SINGING AND ELSEWHERE

By W. S. Drew

Most people who write about rhythm in music seem to try to escape, in one way or another, from the contemplation of the fact that rhythmical effects are based on equality of time-intervals. When they catch sight of this fact, which indeed they cannot help doing occasionally, they proceed—as a famous Prime Minister was once accused of doing to a fact inconvenient to his immediate controversial purpose—to bury it under a heap of rhetoric.*

The discomfort which many people feel when an attempt is made to analyse the processes of the technique of any art may be due to their regarding art as a kind of conjuring. The chief objects of the conjurer are to puzzle and surprise; a knowledge of his methods tends to render his tricks ineffective. But the object of the artist is to delight those senses through which we experience æsthetic pleasure, and so to bring about that stimulation of the imagination which is the essence of all art. These objects are not affected by a knowledge of his technical processes. The philosopher with the most profound knowledge of physiology is just as susceptible to the prick of a pin as his less instructed neighbours.

Some of the most fascinating works of art are those that produce their effects by the simplest means, so that there is very little need to be afraid that the dignity or mystery of the art of music will be removed if it be found on examination that one of its chief pleasures is associated with something as simple as the division of its duration into equal intervals.

No one will agree with the unqualified statement that playing in time is the same thing as playing rhythmically. On the other hand, the same person who has contemptuously disagreed with such a statement will probably pause a little before answering the question whether one can play rhythmically without playing in time. The verbally fluent will fill up this interval with rhetoric in which, as likely as not, the magic word 'personality' will play a prominent part. But it would be better to employ the time in considering that parodoxes of this kind are always due to the inadequacy of the verbal symbols used. The use of the same word for things differing in nature—or differing only in degree—is one of the most fruitful sources of confusion of thought and the profitless controversy which is its inevitable attendant.

* 'Rhythm is the great governing force in music. It is the embodiment and thrilling expression of movement in terms of sound. It is movement in vital ebb and flow, but informed with principle, and disciplined and controlled to creative purpose and expression. Movement at this high power of conveyance seems to stir and quicken our being. We are under the sway of an impulse mighty as any we know. That impulse is rhythm.' Leonard Borwick (Music and Letters, January, 1925).

The rhetorical method of attacking the difficult question of the meaning of the word 'rhythm' has already been mentioned. Most of us know the story which illustrates another method: that of the theological lecturer who said, 'Here we come to a very difficult passage; let us look it boldly in the face and pass on.' In the last section of 'The Prelude to Poetry'* there is a reprint of an address delivered some years ago by Dr. Robert Bridges. The paragraph headed 'Rhythm of Words' begins, 'Rhythm is a difficult subject, and we must be content to let it pass.' At first sight this seems weaker even than the attitude of the theologian, for Dr. Bridges apparently wastes no time in trying to stare the difficulty out of countenance; but he immediately repents of this weakness, and goes on to say that an idea of rhythm may be got by watching a good skater or dancer. This illustration is helpful in clearing up our ideas of the meaning of the word, for here it is obviously used in connection with the regular reiteration of a set of visual impressions. The skater's bar begins when he strikes off with one foot or the other; the position and balance of the body then alters till the supporting foot is able to give the push which transfers the weight to the other foot. But why go to skating or dancing for an example of rhythm? Why not use walking as an example, for with the exception of small details the same analysis applies? The answer is that walking is not such a good example because the beats are more rapid and, owing to familiarity, are easily grasped as a whole: that is to say, the word 'rhythmic' is not usually applied to rapid reiteration of sounds, sights, or motions which are not easily analysable into elements.

We should not apply the term 'rhythmical' to the regular beat of a carpenter's hammer as he drives a nail into a plank. But three navvies driving a wedge into the surface of a road often produce a very satisfactory rhythm, because the sounds of the three beats are distinguishable, and there is a feeling of disappointment if a beat comes out of time or if one of the workmen misses his stroke. So too the beat of a boy's stick as he drags it along some palings would be called regular, not rhythmical; but the beats of the heart, even when they appear to be regularly spaced—as sometimes happens—are almost always referred to as rhythmic, because the beats are distinguishable both as to strength and quality.

It seems reasonable therefore to define rhythm in music as being the regular reiteration of a pattern of two or more beats, and rhythmical playing as being such playing as makes this regular reiteration clear. It is in this sense that the terms are used in this essay. Some people will doubtless feel that it is a very inadequate definition of what they mean by rhythm, but it does at least face the difficulty of putting a little stiffening into a word which has been weakened into vagueness by misuse.

If we now return to the distinction between playing in time and playing rhythmically, it is only necessary to allow a certain amount of latitude in the interpretation of the phrase 'playing in time.' For there are really two ways of playing in time. Of these, one gives pleasure and the other, as a rule, does not. It is the former that is called playing rhythmically.

At first sight it is not clear how there can be more than one kind of playing in time, for it seems that the notes must either be given their correct values or not. But the latitude spoken of before applies to the size of the units chosen. A musical phrase which is divided up into bars of four crotchets may be played so that each crotchet takes up the same amount of time. If this were done it would naturally follow that each bar would take the same time—exactly four times as long as each crotchet. It is plain however that there are other ways of keeping to the equality of the larger unit, the bar; for various liberties may be taken with the individual crotchets without interfering with the length of the bar. And these liberties may themselves be regular or irregular. Every first crotchet in each bar may last a little longer than the other three; or any crotchet in any bar may be lengthened provided that the time is made up elsewhere within the limits of that bar. Speaking very generally—of course there will be exceptions—it is the equality of the larger units which is of importance; it is the bar and not the beat which must be kept regular in order to give a satisfactory effect. The performer often puts unnecessary difficulties in his way by not choosing his rhythmical unit on a sufficiently large scale. The rhythmic unit of the waltz, for instance, need be no smaller than two bars; when it is taken smaller than that the dance will always lack a certain character or swing. The first beat of every two-bar unit should be strictly in its correct time-position, and made sufficiently emphatic in one way or another to catch the attention of the dancer. If this rule is adhered to, the performer may take all sorts of time-liberties without being found out; no one minds very much if he occasionally stops playing in waltz-time, and, as everyone knows, the dancers themselves often alter their steps from a three-beat to a two-beat measure. The so-called 'jazz bands' as a rule play waltzes badly. Their usual music does not encourage them to think in large units. As far as rhythm is concerned, they think parochially rather than imperially.*

* 'Everyman' Series. J. M. Dent.

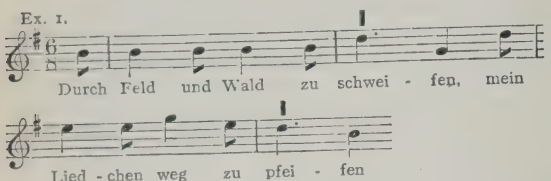
Even in 6-8 measure, when the tempo is rapid, a two-bar unit is often quite small enough. A subtle emphasis on the words 'schweifen,' 'pfeifen,' &c., swings 'Der Musensohn' along with a much more satisfactory stride, and also incidentally prevents him from putting down his foot too decidedly at places where no emphasis is wanted:

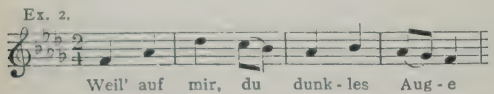
Ex. 1.



As a rule the choice of a small rhythmical unit tends to make music sound mechanical and monotonous, but there are special effects to be got in this way which must by no means be despised. It is very seldom, however, that a small unit rigidly adhered to is permissible in singing, for the simple reason that it makes the words sound formal and unnatural. The singer generally requires a little more elasticity within the bar or rhythmical unit than the instrumental player. These liberties are less noticeable in singing on account of what may be called the listener's expectation of irregularity where verbal syllables are concerned. In fact, the time durations of the syllables of spoken words and sentences are so unequal that it might be supposed that it would hardly be possible to set the syllables of any poem to a succession of equal notes without robbing the words entirely of their elasticity and vitality. To those, however, who are susceptible to the language of any art, a very small hint is all that is needed; and so it comes about that on occasions such as these, the amount of variation which has to be made by the singer in order to suggest the naturalness of the spoken word is very slight, and it can be done with the minimum of damage to the musical form of the bar or phrase.

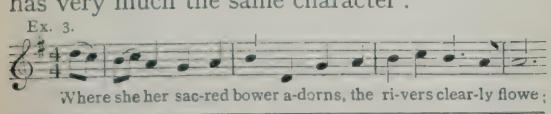
The song 'Bitte,' by Robert Franz, is written in such a way that, with the exception of one word in the first line and one in the last, each syllable throughout the song has the same duration:

Ex. 2.



Campion's 'Where she her sacred bower adorns' has very much the same character:

Ex. 3.

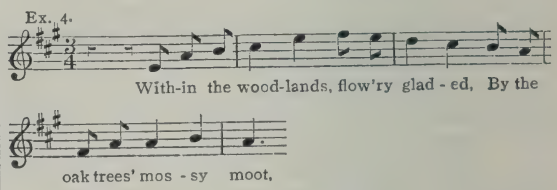


* I was once at a dance where the big drum made, or so it seemed to me, $2\times60\times60\times5$ consecutive equidistant thumps, i.e., two a second for five hours on end.

In such songs a fairly rigid adherence to exact equality in the duration of the crotchets is in keeping with the smooth and dignified character of the music, so that the danger of an impression of monotony and formality in the regularly following syllables has to be overcome by really fine legato singing combined with nicely-graded emphases on the important words in each verbal phrase. If this is not done properly the music changes from a hymn into a hearse carrying the dead body of the poem—not into a dirge, be it noted, for a dirge is a medium for the expression of living grief.

As an example of a song where the words may easily be deprived of all their charm by a too conscientious attitude towards time-values within the bar, we may take Vaughan Williams's 'Linden Lea':

Ex. 4.



Here the rhythmical unit should be no shorter than one bar long, and when the general musical structure has been grasped, the words should be allowed to take charge of the situation. If the listener then discovers that the music has been tampered with, it merely means that the words have abused their position of authority. It is hardly necessary to add that it is the singer's business to see that this does not happen.

The singer who wishes to sing rhythmically should always begin by studying his songs as pieces of music pure and simple. He should go through the song a good many times, using the voice as a musical instrument only, not as a verbal one. If he can get some instrumentalist, a fiddler or a clarinettist, to play the melody to him, so much the better. When he has a clear idea of the 'shape' of the song as a piece of music, he is not nearly so liable to take unjustifiable liberties with the rhythm in his attempts to bring off verbal and dramatic effects. Unless the song is very badly written, he should find no difficulty in producing all the effects he wants without interfering with the rights of the music. He will find that he has considerable freedom within the limits of the rhythmical sections.

If we take at random a dozen singers and a dozen instrument players—the only necessary qualification of the two classes being that they shall be good enough to be listened to with pleasure by the ordinary music-lover—we shall almost certainly find that the instrumentalists have had a more strenuous training and are better musicians than the singers. This in itself will be sufficient to account for the generally recognised weakness of the ordinary singer as far as time-keeping and rhythm are concerned, but to be quite fair it is necessary to consider some of the difficulties which are peculiar to the art of singing.

The beginning of the bar—or the incidence of the individual beat—for the instrument player coincides with the time when he presses down his key,* plucks his string, or draws his bow across it. But the peculiarities of the sung word are such that the singer, except on the occasions when his word begins with a vowel, has to anticipate the beat.

Every vocal bar or beat begins with a vowel. We will begin by considering this fact, which is one of the inevitable difficulties of fitting words and music together, and afterwards go on to consider another, which is the result of carelessness of notation on the part of composers; or, to put the matter a little less accusingly, the result of the necessary simplification of the visual signs which have to stand for something very complicated in the auditory field. Although these are difficulties which the trained musician might take in his stride if he, after instrumental training, turned his attention to singing, yet it has to be remembered that a great many singers do not get a previous training of this kind, so that they have to be warned against the musical faults to which their art is specially prone. On the other hand, the instrumentalist himself is liable to mistake the time at which he makes an effort to articulate an initial consonant for the time that marks the beat for the listener. The exact nature of this error will be discussed in what follows.

A good example to take is Schubert's 'Aufenthalt.' A well-marked rhythm is the most important trait in the character of this song. By a well-marked rhythm is meant one where the landmarks—to borrow a word from the visual world—are made quite clear to the listener:

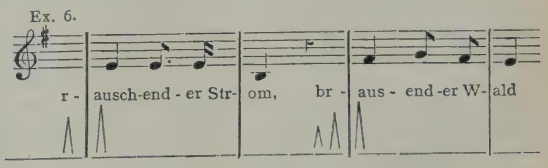
By the time the six bars of the introduction are nearing their end, the accompanist, unless he has done his work very badly, has established a strong expectation on the part of the listener for the precise moment at which the first beat of the seventh bar should arrive. This is the moment where the voice, according to the literal interpretation of the visual signs, begins also. But if the singer delays his entry until this exact moment he fails entirely to make a satisfactory accent on the first beat, and so fails also, as judged by the listener, to fall in with the previously established rhythm. The reason for this is not difficult to see. The first word of the phrase begins with the sound represented by the letter r. This sound must be started sufficiently early to allow the following vowel-sound to coincide exactly with the first beat of the bar. The r, like other continuants, is a sound which can and must be sung on a definite note, and a good singer can put a considerable intensity of sound into it. But the following vowel-sound is always appreciably louder. This difference of intensity is still more marked when the word begins with an unvoiced consonant. The consequence is that there are at least two attacks for every word that begins with a consonant. Experiment will quickly convince one that it is the stronger (or strongest) that has to coincide with the instrumental beat, or with the previously-established rhythmical expectation.

When therefore a bar, according to the visual signs, begins with a consonant, this consonant must be pulled back into the previous bar. This is shown in the diagram, where the size of the triangles in the lower line indicates roughly the relative intensity of the sounds as the syllable is attacked:

Ex. 6.



It is plain that this diagram overcomes only one of the discrepancies between the visual signs and the sounds they represent. The visual signs are separate, whereas the sounds they represent are continuous; moreover, if the bar-lines are meant to represent the beginning of the bar in time, the crotchet, the au, and the large triangle should be printed actually on the line.

The representation of the passage in this way, however, brings out the interesting point that the most awkward collection of verbal sounds in it is set to the shortest note. We find that we have to sing ershtr (English spelling) to a semiquaver. Schubert tempers what might otherwise seem an unkindness to the singer (for to sing ershtr to a semiquaver at a fast tempo is beyond the power of most of us) by the instruction 'Nicht zu geschwind, doch kräftig' ('Not too fast, yet forceful'). But, in spite of warnings of this kind, the commonest sin against rhythmical singing is just that of taking things too fast—too fast, that is, for the diction technique of the singer. Many singers take 'Ungeduld' much too fast for themselves; though not necessarily too fast for the music of the vocal line when treated instrumentally, that is, without any verbal complications. Schubert marks it 'Etwas geschwind' ('Rather fast'); but when we examine the song we find passages like this:

* The pause between the pressing down of the key and the 'speaking' of the pipe makes the use of some stops on the organ very vague and tiresome to listen to (on the rhythmical side) when used in conjunction with stops that speak more readily.

ichssschr, all to be sung in the twinkling of a semiquaver. Perhaps this is the worst difficulty, but we also have ansbr, absl, erktn, and so on in the words 'man's brennen,' 'gab's laut,' and 'merkt nichts,' and all these are given no more than a semiquaver of time. These difficulties of diction really go a long way towards settling the tempo of such songs, at all events for the individual singer, for he may sing the song as fast as he can manage these sounds on a semiquaver without being late on the following vowel. Let him try singing the song really fast without the pianoforte, and see what happens to the shape of it. It will probably need no more than this to convince him that the essence of the matter is not merely keeping up with the accompaniment somehow. In other words, if one wishes to take up an uncompromisingly conscientious attitude towards the song 'Ungeduld,' the limit of speed is determined by the length of time it takes to sing ichssschr; for this determines the shortest length of the semiquaver, of which, naturally, all the other notes must be multiples. Practically, however, the occasional singing of as , where there are particularly awkward combinations of consonants does no serious damage to the structure of the song.

Enough has now been said to show why good instrumentalists do not always make a success of their song-rhythms when they turn their attention to singing. It is partly due, as has already been suggested, to a want of recognition of the precise way in which vocal attack differs from instrumental attack, and partly to a lack of the technique of diction. It is hardly necessary to add that this lack is for the most part the result of sluggish habits of speaking, and does not occur when people are able to articulate their words rapidly and distinctly in ordinary conversation.

Dr. E. C. Bairstow has been appointed to be Professor of Music at Durham University in succession to the late Dr. Joseph C. Bridge; and Dr. W. G. Whittaker will be James W. Allsop Lecturer in Music at the University of Liverpool for the session 1929-30.

Ad Libitum

By 'Feste'

In a recent issue of the New York Herald-Tribune, Mr. Lawrence Gilman had an interesting article headed 'A Symphonic Best Seller.' The 'best seller' in question was the symphony that headed the poll in the annual voting for the Philadelphia Orchestra's annual 'request' programme. The winning symphony has been the same on six occasions since the season of 1921-22. Can the reader guess the composer? He will probably have two shots, naming Beethoven (No. 5) and Tchaikovsky (the 'Pathétique'), and will then give it up. The surprising answer is—César Franck! The Beethoven and Tchaikovsky works have been its nearest competitors, and for many years the 'Pathétique' held first place. It was beaten by the Franck in 1921-22, and this year was sixth on the list, with Beethoven's No. 5, Brahms's No. 1, Dvorák's 'New World,' and Tchaikovsky's E minor in front of it.

A few years ago—say towards the end of the war and for a while afterwards—Franck might have headed a similar plebiscite over here, but he would hardly do so to-day. At present poor César is under a cloud—a temporary one, no doubt. He is undergoing the ordeal that all but the very greatest composers—and sometimes even they—go through: that of being 'found out.' Every composer whose chief works are standing dishes has to endure this test. A few works are over-played, and at once the assiduous concert-goer (especially if he be a music critic) begins to weary of it, and to cock a more than usually critical eye at its composer. Franck's Symphony was something of a discovery during the period when German music dropped into the background and that of France and Belgium came to the front. It was played perhaps a little too frequently then, and there has since been an inevitable tendency to fasten on to its obvious weaknesses. Perhaps no representative symphony carries its blemishes in so embarrassingly open a manner. They simply invite attack. It is one of the best of tributes to the work that it is yet able to survive its glaring faults. For my part, I never have any difficulty in turning a lenient, semi-deaf ear to that invertebrate 'Faith' theme (surely the faith represented by so puny a subject is not the sort that moves mountains; even a sizable ant-hill might defy it!), to the irritating pulling-up at times, and to the very organist-like scoring. And I believe that when the critics have said their last damaging word, the Symphony will remain a steady favourite with the average concert-goer. Still, as I said above, I don't think London would follow Philadelphia in giving it top place.

Mr. Gilman brings forward the popularity of Franck's Symphony as a proof that there is very little in Mr. Compton Mackenzie's suggestion that classical works would be made more popular by the addition of a fancy title, or by the concoction of a 'programme.' Mr. Mackenzie seems to be supported by Beethoven's Fifth (with its story about Fate knocking at the door); the 'Unfinished' (its title and the circumstances of the composer's end); the 'Pathétique' (its label and the apocryphal story concerning the composer's suicide); the 'Eroïca'; and Beethoven's Seventh (Wagner's description of it as the apotheosis of the dance). But as much evidence may be brought forward on the other side. Mr. Gilman points out that the C minor of Brahms is entirely free of any extra-musical associations, yet at the recent Philadelphia voting it very nearly tied with Beethoven's Fifth for second place; and he adds that in New York to-day it is a prime favourite. In fact, it is so much of a 'winner' that it has been chosen for the opening programme of the Stadium concert—which is analogous to putting it in the bill of fare for the opening night of the 'Proms.' And as Mr. Gilman says, all we know of Franck's work is that it is a symphony in D minor; yet it has topped the bill for six times in eight seasons. Again, among the most popular symphonies are the G minor and the E flat of Mozart, neither of which, I imagine, would receive a vote less than their companion nicknamed the 'Jupiter.' Nor is Haydn's 'Surprise' Symphony nearly so popular as one or two of his that have no label. Chamber music gives us ample evidence as to the needlessness of a title. Here the majority of the greatest things in all music have managed to achieve and retain popularity with no more attractive a title than, say, Quartet in E flat.

Coming to ordinary concert works, there leap to mind at once many phenomenally popular pieces that have no fancy label, e.g., Jarnefeldt's Præludium, Boccherini's Minuet, Raff's Cavatina, Handel's Largo—the list might easily be extended. Spring songs are as pebbles on the beach for multitude, and so there is little in the title; yet Mendelssohn's example manages to stand out easily as the most popular. Even the much-labelled and be-programmed Prelude of Rachmaninov was popular when it was merely a prelude and nothing else. I remember well (I was a small boy at the time) how the piece arrived and took us all by storm. The numerous fantastic and ridiculous programmes were tacked on afterwards. In fact, there are many other examples of works achieving popularity first and being honoured by a label as a result. (Mendelssohn's 'Songs Without Words' contain several examples, e.g., 'The Bee's Wedding.') What happens is that some musical writer, cursed with a cinema mind, sees a piece of abstract music that has a vogue, and says, 'Hullo, this must have a programme or a title,' and promptly invents one.

Mr. Gilman, like many more of us, is a little puzzled to account for the popularity of certain symphonies. He points out, for example, that the Franck has not the overwhelming emotionalism of the 'Pathétique' nor the dramatic power and directness of Beethoven's Fifth. Public taste is thus an interesting problem in itself. It would be worth while, perhaps, to appoint a musical equivalent to a Royal Commission, the terms of reference being:

1. To inquire into the reasons, if any, for the popularity of a given work, and the comparative neglect of an equally good or even superior work by the same composer or in the same style.
2. The possibility of organizing a plebiscite that should yield conclusive results. At present only a small (and perhaps the least musical) proportion of an audience will take the trouble to fill up the voting paper, so one of the first steps would be to ensure representative voting.
3. To consider the almost complete unreliability of conductors' and performers' estimates of a new work.

As to (3): a composer's failure is understandable; but it is not easy to explain the frequency with which an experienced conductor completely fails to gauge the value and popular appeal of a new work. A composer works more or less in the dark. A conductor has, or should have, more practical experience and sense of what 'comes off'; and moreover he has the benefit of the light thrown on the music during rehearsal. Yet many a novelty 'flops' so completely that hearers naturally wonder at its selection. Similar miscalculations happen in the dramatic and literary worlds. How comes it that experienced theatrical managers often risk a small fortune in rehearsing and producing a play that has only to be publicly performed in order to be damned? And in the case of books, publishers' advisers make a very large proportion of bad shots. Even more mysterious is the recent example of a novel backed as 'The book of the month' by the newly-formed 'Book-Society.' The jury were all well-known literary men, yet if we may judge from a reliable reviewer, the book thus singled out for distinction is a hopeless 'dud.'

If any further proof were needed of the unreliability of box-office considerations as a test of quality and even of attractiveness in music, it may be seen in the B.B.C.'s many performances of neglected works. Over and over again we find in the wireless programmes unknown works, by composers both famous and obscure, which prove to be excellent in quality and attractive in style. One wonders if the B.B.C. performances and programmes are being studied as they should be by conductors and concert artists as a help in the enlargement of their repertory. I have heard many listeners express surprise at the vast quantities of unfamiliar treasures that are thus broadcast week by week.

The whole question is of prime importance to music and musicians, and deserves to be debated exhaustively by some representative body.

It is true that there still remains an incalculable factor—the audience. Just as on occasion an orchestra will for some unaccountable reason play far above or below its real form, so an audience will 'fall for' a given work on one day and almost yawn through it the next. Even when we make allowance for such contributory causes as weather, temperature of the concert-room, lighting, order of the programme, the showmanship (or the reverse) of the conductor, &c., there is still much to explain. (No doubt the blessed word 'mass-psychology' will be trotted out!) Anyway, the more one sees of audiences the more one feels that they are as variable as performers. In fact, they are performers in a way. Like an orchestra, they are much quicker in the uptake on one day than on another. We see the same thing in the field of sport. A football team can do nothing right at times; the ball rolls badly for them, they say. Similarly, a cricket team fields fifty per cent. better on one day than the next. On Monday nothing is missed; every 'chance' goes to hand and stops there. On Tuesday everything is dropped that is droppable. As the captain says with justifiable bitterness, 'There 's an epidemic, but it isn't catching.'

Public music-making must always be a gamble, but it need not be so speculative as it is. Over and over again we find a bad arrangement of the programme, irritating delays, late starts, and other unnecessary hindrances to an audience's receptivity. There is, as I said above, room for a searching investigation. Why shouldn't concert-givers, conductors, and managers study 'form' of composers, works, artists, and audiences in much the same way as followers of the Turf study that of horses? There is even a musical equivalent to the well-known racing tag 'Horses for courses'—I mean, for example, the way a work will be a success in a certain hall, or on a given occasion, and be a failure almost consistently in other circumstances. (There are many analogous cases in games. To give one only: For a long spell of years Surrey could never make more than a miserable show when playing Kent at Blackheath.) I believe that if musicians gave their mind to it, they would be able to spot 'winners' with a degree of certainty that, transplanted to the Turf, would soon put the bookmakers on the dole.

THE BERLIOZ ENIGMA

By J. H. Elliot

The peculiar problems which centre in the music of Hector Berlioz seem as far as ever from satisfactory solution. The belated arrival of a band of ardent champions (some of whom, by the way, are equally distinguished for the ferocity with which they attack other composers, notably Wagner—a point not, perhaps, without significance) has in recent months aggravated the situation. We are asked to believe, if we are willing to believe anything good of Berlioz, that his music contains a magic that is absent from Bach, a strength and purity that were denied to Wagner, and a subtlety to which Mozart could in no sense attain. Critics who are less fervent in their admiration are not, however, readily convinced, and the old discussion has taken a new lease of life.

There is, however, little to be gained by pursuing the controversy on technical lines. To deny that Berlioz was a melodist on the ground that his phrases cover a wider span than those of other composers, or to denounce his harmonic progressions by text-book standards, is not necessarily conclusive. The most startling departures from accepted practice can always be justified; and in the case of Berlioz, criticism of this nature is met by the retort that the methods employed are, in fact, so justified. On the other hand, it is pointless to uphold Berlioz as, for instance, a great melodist when the anti's merely reply with the contention that his melodic lines, even admitting their legitimacy, have no musical vitality. The whole discussion must end in deadlock, judgment upon the æsthetic value of Berlioz's music being still divided. In a word, technical dissection by itself will not advance the question; it will merely complicate the conditions of it.

How, then, is it possible to approach the matter? Only, it would seem, by inquiry into the general character of, and the various stimuli which promote, the trend of Berlioz's art, can any light be gained. In point of fact, the art of Berlioz was not an entirely musical one. As a composer, pure music held no meaning for him, and musical logic as an abstract condition was entirely outside his system of values. A development from an exposition possessed no inherent virtue from his point of view; even the exposition, by and in itself, could have no particular meaning. A musical phrase of Berlioz's was never shaped from any considerations of pure design; it had to imply—nay, it had to be—something more than a mere musical mot. It was not, in a sense, intended to create music, but rather to be a tonal embodiment of some definite conception, defying analysis and appraisement in any strictly musical terms.

The subjectivity of Berlioz's work is therefore extreme. Although the French master is invariably—and, indeed, correctly—hailed as a Romanticist, his artistic method is totally different from that of other composers for whom the label serves as an indication of their general ideals and procedures. The Webers, the Chopins, and the Schumanns never completely isolated music from the sphere of its own logic in order to subordinate it to an extra-musical concept. Formal considerations were slackened at the behest of a poetic idea, but no matter how vivid the implication, the purely musical was always in the ascendency. The music, so to say, absorbed the non-musical idea and transmuted it into musical terms. The process was, indeed, one of analogy and suggestion rather than direct expression. Berlioz, on the other hand, exploited a species of realism ; he has more affinity, so far as general method is concerned, with Moussorgsky, the Honegger of ' Pacific 231 ' and the Stravinsky of ' Le Sacre,' than with composers who comprise the Romantic school as popularly understood. Berlioz removed the conditions of his music bodily into another sphere. His primary concern was not so much the production of a musical score as the delineation by musical formulæ of some conception totally outside the ordinary range of musical expression.

The pictorialism of Berlioz, as Mr. Cecil Gray pointed out in his ' History of Music,' is addressed solely to the intellect. There is no emotional appeal comparable, for instance, to that of the descriptive pages in Wagner. The leaping flames in ' The Valkyrie,' or the murmurs of the forest in ' Siegfried,' have their own emotional and æsthetic—that is, their purely musical—appeal. The Berlioz visions remain cold and distant, like delicate, transparent pictures thrown upon a screen, but visualised by the ear and not by the eye. The ' Orgy of Brigands ' in ' Harold,' for example, is musically unexciting, despite its wild frenzy. Berlioz completely overshoots musical appeal and directly addresses the mental ear. He even eschews the method of emotional suggestion in musical terms, thereby burning his last bridge and discarding the only legitimate connection between music and her sister arts. The resultant collection of musical sounds is frequently no more music than the array of words set out by Miss Gertrude Stein—with the intention, presumably, of obtaining effects not possible by the intelligible manipulation of language—is literature.

It is useless to deny that each art has its own boundaries. Music has her own restrictions, and not even the genius of Berlioz could overcome them. It cannot be contended, therefore, that he created a new artistic medium. In the absence of its programme, the major portion of Berlioz's music conveys no message to the musical sensibility—the only receptive vehicle to which implication in musical terms can successfully be addressed. The only positive delight may be derived from the exquisite, sensitive scoring, which, surely, is the purest and most miraculous exploitation of characteristic timbres in the literature of music. The pleasure which arises from felicities of sheer tonal colour-blends is, however, essentially artificial. Orchestration is the newest factor in a comparatively new art, and tone-blending must wait upon design, having, by and in itself, no significance. It may heighten, but not convey, an artistic idea.

Considered purely as music, much of Berlioz is indeterminate, if not incoherent. ' Romeo at the Tomb of the Capulets,' in ' Romeo and Juliet,' is, apart from its detailed programme, vague, meaningless, disjointed, and unmusical. Berlioz's own note in the score is significant : ' The public has no imagination. Music which appeals only to the imagination has then no public. The following instrumental scene is of that kind,' &c. Berlioz adds that the movement ought not to be performed except before an ' intelligent audience ' thoroughly familiar with the fifth Act of Shakespeare's drama. What a condition for a musician, employing music as his medium, to impose ! The plain truth of the matter is that an ' instrumental scene ' of this character is not, and never can be considered as, music. Much of Berlioz's work is of this genre. Page after page of ' Romeo and Juliet ' follows the same method, which results in a gorgeous web of tone-colour without an ounce of purely musical significance or vitality. Like a hollow sphere of icing, wrought with the highest skill and cunning known to the confectioner's art, it gives pleasure for the moment, and then dissolves and is forgotten ; there is no bun in the centre. We are left with a vague impression of its characteristic taste, but the digestion has nothing to work upon. That is to say, the most acute musical memory can hardly recall two successive bars after the performance.

The same is substantially true of most other Berlioz achievements. The ' Requiem ' evokes here and there a nebulous impression of something sinister and menacing ; but we witness it as a far-off, veiled spectacle, and experience no thrill of terror. That is, there is no musical sensation —the only conceivable legitimate effect of a performance of music, though it may, of course, be a stimulation either primarily intellectual or emotional in character. ' The Trojans,' again, possesses a purity of melodic line that has all the classic poise of Gluck ; but there is neither the dramatic sting nor the subtle suggestion that Gluck conveyed.

It would, nevertheless, be idle to deny that Berlioz scored many successes on the purely musical side. The concept to be delineated was not always deliberately symbolised in cold musical formulæ ; there was, at times, a definite musical stimulation arising from the conditions of the literary basis. Berlioz occasionally followed the only course open to legitimate programme music—that of absorbing the atmosphere of his concept and presenting it in terms of musical sensation with an inherent, an artistic, significance. The exquisite love-scene in ' Romeo and Juliet,' for instance, is something more than a mere manipulation of musical sounds ; it is music, coherent as such, independently of programme, and æsthetically vital. The musical successes of Berlioz have, moreover, one peculiar characteristic—which, indeed, is common to all his work—that of purity. Berlioz is often indefinite, sometimes jejune and even blatant, but never erotic. In the jargon of to-day, there is nothing sexual in Berlioz—one reason, doubtless, why extravagant worship of him so often goes hand-in-hand with equally extreme denunciation of Wagner and the sultry passions with which much of his music is saturated. This virtue, however, is purely relative and, indeed, superficial. The artistic standards are concerned with the quality, not with the trend, of expression in an art-work. Eroticism may generate as good, or as bad, a work of art as austerity and virginal purity ; and the plain truth is that Wagner's music —to borrow another current expression—possesses this eroticism and that of Berlioz does not.

Even admitting the musical significance of many a Berlioz page, it is still patent that his stature as a musician, in comparison with that of other composers, is not high. Where there are sufficient bases of comparison—that is, where Berlioz confines himself to the normal methods of musical expression—he is never found to be supremely great; indeed, is often seen as a commonplace, and frequently as a definitely feeble, craftsman. Apart from orchestration, in which Berlioz is admittedly supreme, the 'Dance of the Sylphs,' the 'Queen Mab' Scherzo, and the rest may be matched in the pages of many composers by no means in the front rank. The fairies of Weber and Mendelssohn have as much, or more, musical vitality. The Rakoczy March arrangement is, of course, a tour de force; but when Berlioz attempted an original march, that in 'The Trojans,' the result was lamentable.

The great mass of Berlioz's music, however, is in no sense comparable to that of other composers; it is differently conceived and differently applied. The purely musical standards are unavailing; Berlioz demands that the auditor be en rapport with his unique scheme of intellectual picturisation—a kind of perverted impressionism, a blend of aural literature and aural kinematography—and asks for a high degree of musical experience while ignoring the musical sensibility itself. In fine, Berlioz made use of musical means for purposes other than that of creating music as it is commonly—and, indeed, as only it can be—understood.

As I conceive it, the whole fabric of Berlioz's art is founded on error. In attempting directly to create extra-musical conditions in musical terms, without reliance upon the normal responses to their stimuli, Berlioz committed the fault of trying to cause one artistic medium to perform the functions of others; for expression in music—as opposed to mere imitation—is essentially ambiguous, and precise mental delineation, whether of concrete or abstract conceptions, is not, and never can be, a legitimate function of the art.

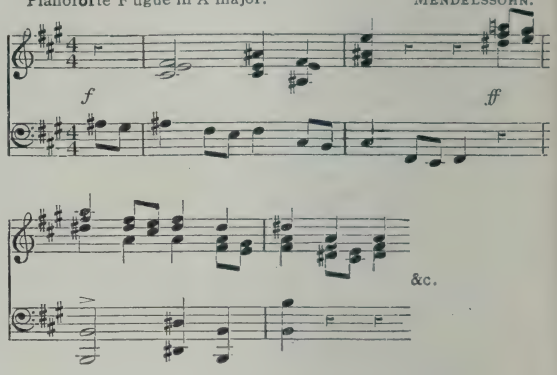
FRANCK'S TECHNIQUE

By A. J. B. Hutchings

The term 'mysticism' is often used indiscriminately and nebulously by musical critics who do not justify its employment by concrete reference and quotation. It is said that when a creative artist wishes to express his experiences of things infinite through finite media—words, paint, sound—he has to use the language of symbolism. Of course, all media are symbolic in the wide sense of the word, but my contention is that if a critic finds a certain '-ism' predominant in a given work, he should be prepared to select some definite group of symbols by which the particular quality is distinctively expressed. Indeed, there is a definite technique of mystical expression; in the realm of literature it has been expounded by such scholars as Dr. Spurgeon and Evelyn Underhill, but in the realm of music few critics—not even the worshipping d'Indy—have indicated it in any but vague terms. Formal analysis is not sufficient, one must murder and dissect. It is said that somehow the listener can tell exactly when music ceases to be only an emotional and intellectual pleasure, and causes him to share an adventure of the soul, and that the music of Franck more consistently exercises this influence than that of any other composer. It remains, then, to dissect Franck's technique in cold blood, and so to find inductively the secrets of mystical expression in music.

First, his harmony. He is said to belong to the late Romantic school. What did the romanticists do for harmony? For one thing they discovered and exploited the possibilities of the chord of the dominant seventh. Here is a sample from Mendelssohn:

Ex. 1.
Pianoforte Fugue in A major. MENDELSSOHN.



Franck shares the love of this chord, the strength and weakness of the romanticists; but neither Schumann nor Mendelssohn ever used it in so magical a way as this*:

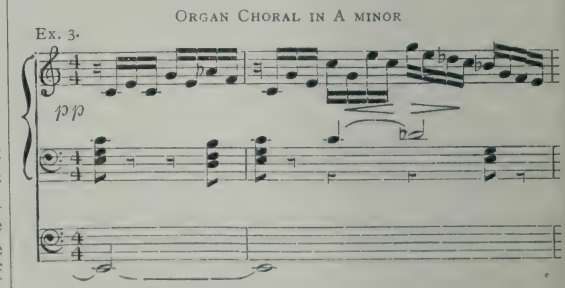
VIOLIN SONATA

Ex. 2.

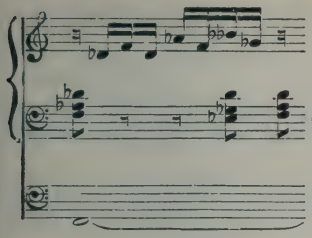
The specimen is characteristically Franckian, and why? For one thing because the dominant seventh used here is not only an inversion itself, but is sandwiched between two first inversions. Franck was a master of inversions, and I feel convinced that this power is one of the factors in his mystical expression. There is something dramatically vast in certain first inversions. How often does Beethoven use a solemn first inversion, sometimes protracted or repeated, when he is magnificently pawing the ground for a sudden change or spring?—exactly as Franck does in the page full of first inversions beginning:

ORGAN CHORAL IN A MINOR

Ex. 3.



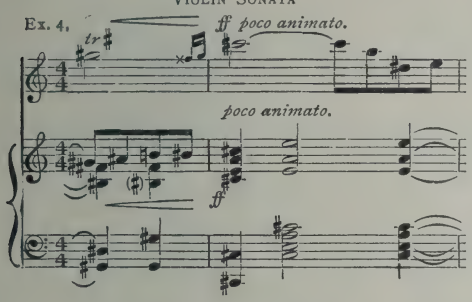
* Although we agree with Mr. Hutchings as to the effect of the chord in Ex. 2, we suggest that it is more rightly regarded as a second inversion of the augmented sixth (bass F♯=E𝄪)—a progression to which Franck was very partial.—[EDITOR.]



or in such single instances as :

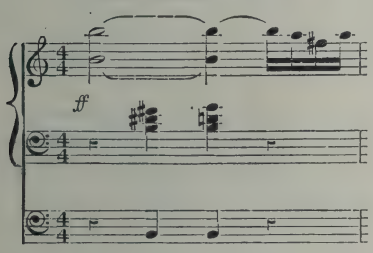
VIOLIN SONATA

Ex. 4.



ORGAN CHORAL IN B MINOR

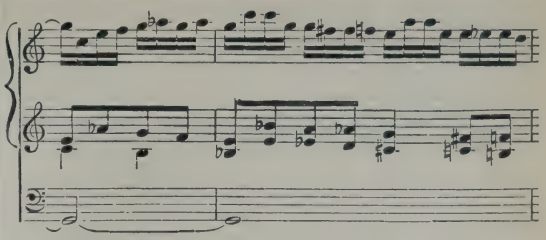
Ex. 5.



and just as in these last two examples it is seen how the first inversion makes a dramatic beginning for a soaring flight, so the second inversion is Franck's means of maintaining wonderful hawk-like poises after a flight of mystical exaltation. I know few passages in all music so rapturous as the following, which illustrates this usage. I wish there were room to quote it more amply :

ORGAN CHORAL IN A MINOR

Ex. 6.



Poised over these second inversion pedal-points will chiefly be seen effects of dominant seventh and diminished seventh. It is here that the mystic Franck differs from other romanticists—in his fondness for the diminished seventh, although Brahms shares this partiality to a certain extent. Examples such as the following are plentiful :

SYMPHONY IN D MINOR

Ex. 7.

Again Franck (with Brahms) is very fond of a cadential diminished seventh. One has only to look through the selection of examples already quoted to realise the ubiquity of this chord in Franck's work. I remember when I first heard the Quintet to have grown quite tired of the chord (the fault must have been mine, because when the Léner Quartet performed the work during their last visit I thoroughly enjoyed every note).

Such, then, are some of Franck's characteristic harmonic colours. It remains to examine his melodic outlines. Again, what did the earlier romanticists do for melody ? They used longer periods, and their melodies seemed more independent of a harmonic foundation than were those of their Viennese predecessors. The melodies of Mozart and Haydn (I judiciously avoid Beethoven's later period) are justly praised, but are they not, even at their most felicitous and spontaneous times, curiously dependent upon their under parts, and usually short-winded, developing by sequence and imitation ? Such a melody as the following could not possibly have come from Mozart :

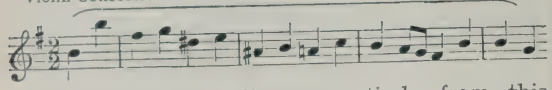
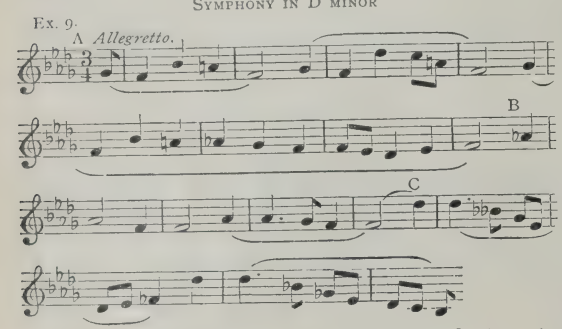
Ex. 8.
Violin Concerto. MENDELSSOHN.



Franck's melody diverges entirely from this freedom of the earlier romanticists—but not retrogressively. He has a melodic idiom exclusively his own, one which, happily, may be shown to have affinity to the methods of literary mystics. The secret of it is this—that to gain a sense of spiritual exaltation one must produce a sense of conquest, and if an artist is to achieve this, he must suggest opposition ; half the thrill of going downhill on a bicycle is given by the rush of air—which is in itself a restraining and opposing element. Franck can suggest resistance and triumph (melodically) in two ways. The first is by a rhythmic device, quite peculiar (I believe) to himself. Consider the following example. Sections A and C show a melody making two or three attempts to break free from its mooring, while section B is itself a check in rhythm :

SYMPHONY IN D MINOR

Ex. 9.

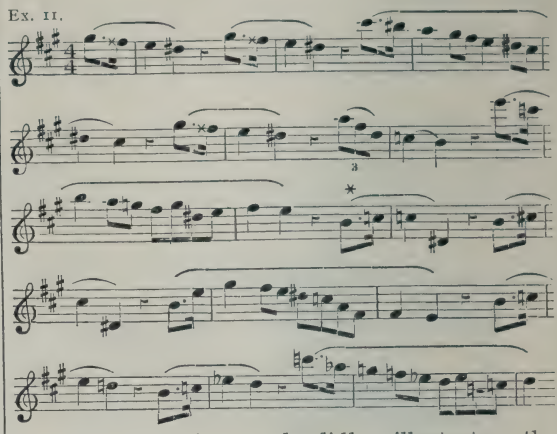


If there were space, I could quote nearly twenty Franckian melodies built on this same plan, and mostly with the same pulse and time-signature. Here is one of the principal themes of the ' Symphonic Variations ' :

Ex. 10. A

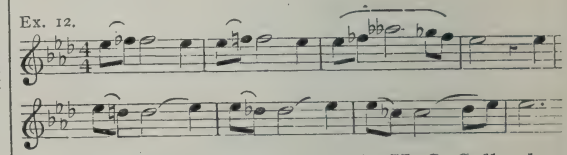
This is what would be called a simple sixteen-bar melody in four sections of four bars (had it come from a different source), but what composer other than Franck would have made a section C like the one here ? Again, there is the same momentary check at the end (asterisk), which makes it more than a sixteen-bar melody after all. The ' mystical interpretations ' which one is tempted to deduce from this device would merely detract from the practical nature of this inquiry ; but surely there can be few melodies which show such a masterly command of mystical technique, such a triumphant expression of struggling and pleading, as this—the complementary theme to Ex. 10 in the ' Symphonic Variations ' :

Ex. 11.



This masterpiece splendidly illustrates the second characteristic melodic device of Franck (it would be useless to asterisk any particular section). This device consists in moving or circulating as if on a tether anchored to a particular note or group of notes. In the first part of Ex. 9 the notes are G flat and F. In the end part of Ex. 11 the notes are B and C. This second device is simply the tonal counterpart of the first rhythmical device. It reaches its apogee in this melody from the Quintet :

Ex. 12.



(In his ' Growth of Music,' Mr. H. C. Colles has an excellent section on Franck, including a passage dealing with this ' circulating ' idiom, and contrasting it with a similar device of Brahms's.) Franck has a third method of suggesting the overcoming of resistance (really a special application of the second method). This consists in ' aiming ' at a certain height of pitch, seeming to fall short of it at first attempt, and successfully reaching it at the second. He uses this device in Ex. 11, at the point marked with an asterisk. Here is a still more beautiful example :

VIOLIN SONATA

Ex. 13.

It is a curious fact that just as Franck was fond of the first inversion of a chord, so in his melodies he seems particularly fond of the mediant, and often uses it for his ' home ' or anchor-note :

SYMPHONY

and just as in his harmony he was a master of inversions, so in his melodies he shows himself, like Wagner, to be a master of suspensions. There is no need to quote any further examples to show this fact, which again enables Franck to depict a retarding pull against the melodic flight. Psychologically the use of both inversions and suspensions may be explained as means to give the listener the pleasure of relief; how often the organist, reading a piece of Franck's, feels tempted to play a chord in its root position, or to follow the 'obvious' curve of a melody, whereas the composer naïvely takes an unexpected turn and decides that the music must not come to rest yet (thus the Fugue is the mystical form par excellence).

Speaking of naïveté, one must not be blind to the blemishes of Franck, on which the new 'Grove' has much to say. The contributor to this work is rather hard on Franck, which is remarkable, since he is evidently an organist. Unfortunately we know, from d'Indy himself, how Franck actually admired certain works of what we should call very bad taste among his contemporaries. But let us shut our eyes to this painful fact, and judge the blemishes in his own creations. Weaknesses in creative work may be either those of conventionality or those of crudeness. Very rarely do we find in Franck the clichés of his contemporaries; where they do occur they belong to the age, not to the man. The mistakes of crudeness, which are manifold, he shares with other great mystics. Ben Jonson was severe upon Donne for not observing the rules of rhyme and rhythm. Crashaw, whose poetry at its best has rarely been exceeded for fiery, hysterical beauty, made the most shocking lapses of 'taste,' and became tawdry and honey-sweet. Francis Thompson, of whom Franck is the musical counterpart, is guilty of all these lapses, while Blake's naïveté reaches childishness.

What is the reason for this common failing of the mystics, which is exhibited by Franck in passages of over-sweetness and over-rich chromaticism? Surely it is that the mystic, rather than forego a symbol at all, will furnish himself with a tawdry imitation from stock-in-trade. In this he is like many devout religious people. One has only to think of the mixture of good and commercial art and craftsmanship in some Catholic churches (I speak as a Catholic myself). One goes, not to the mystics, but the rationalists—Pope, Mozart—for 'correctness' and self-criticism, and the failings of these people are not those of crudeness but of conventionality.

But let us consider as an example one of Franck's most disgusting lapses of taste—the 'tailing off' of the so-called 'Faith' motif in the Symphony (it is too familiar to need quotation). Bad though it is, we feel that Franck strongly wished to convey some aspiration by it; perhaps had he lived in our time, and could have looked detachedly at the achievements and shortcomings of the later romanticists, he would have been more critical of the passage. As it was, he used the symbol which came cheaply to his hands. Yet, as I have said, its context shows that it was intended to express something, and it is as if the listener's mind goes out half-way to meet this—disregarding the blemish and making his own music, so to speak. But, as Wordsworth would have said:

> 'Minds that have little to confer
> Find little to perceive.'

Moreover, if Franck was a mystic, his mysticism was romantic, like Thompson's or that of St. Teresa. That is to say, it was almost erotic, so that sugary chromaticism would be a natural trap for him. There is little of the ascetic mystic in Franck; but romance should be pure. What work has exceeded the purity of the Finale of the Violin Sonata? It is his mysticism which purifies his romanticism. To use modern psychological jargon, his romanticism is 'sublimated,' and taken beyond a thing of feelings to an adventure of the soul. We read in d'Indy of Franck's simple religious piety, and we cannot but feel that there is a quality in such passages as the following which is not to be found in all the romance and drama of Wagner (including 'Parsifal'):

SYMPHONY

Ex. 15.

The quality is one like clairvoyancy, which seems to be given to some to possess more than others, to some to admire more than others—while some are unfortunate enough neither to possess nor admire it. Whether it is communicated consciously or unconsciously by a definite technique is still hard to decide.

Music in the Foreign Press

SCHUBERT'S EARLIEST WORKS

In the May Revue de Musicologie, G. de Saint-Foix devotes an essay to Schubert's earliest instrumental works:

'It has been said and repeated that Schubert, the master of song, had achieved comparatively little in the field of instrumental music. But the more one studies his instrumental works the better one realises their greatness. A careful study of his earliest symphonies, overtures, and string quartets will show that the practice of instrumental music has played the principal part in his formation. These earliest examples of orchestral or chamber music from his pen are amazingly firm, clear, and original. At the age of fifteen or sixteen he had acquired full and free command of the idiom, if not of the forms, of instrumental music; and in his output of that period there is none of the prolixity which sometimes mars his later works. His very earliest attempts have not been preserved; and therefore his string quartets of 1812 and overtures of 1813 seem to have sprung up out of nothingness, so to speak, immature in certain respects, but live and powerful. It is during these two years that some sort of crisis must have occurred within his mind, leading up to complete enlightenment: it was in October, 1813, that he finished writing his first Symphony (in D).'

ANTON REICHA, CÉSAR FRANCK'S TEACHER

In Le Correspondant (May 10), Maurice Emmanuel calls attention to the great influence which Reicha's teaching exercised on César Franck:

'Franck in his first Trio (published in 1841) gave evidence of a mature, far-reaching technique and of lofty aspirations, which for some unaccountable reason were not further displayed in the music he wrote during the next twenty years or so. This technique he owed to the teaching of Anton Reicha, to whom, in 1811, a class of counterpoint and fugue had been entrusted at the Paris Conservatoire. At that time composition was taught there by Boieldieu, Lesueur, and Berton, none of whom were capable of dealing with the technique of instrumental music, nor with polyphony. The director, Cherubini, was hostile to German music and surreptitiously tried to oppose its growing influence. Reicha, however, was able to instruct his pupils in the tradition of Bach, Haydn, and Mozart. Many prominent artists (some of them as old as he) eagerly attended his class: Baillot and Rode, professors of violin at the Conservatoire since 1795, and Habeneck among others. Liszt became his pupil in 1831, and Franck in 1835. Berlioz and Gounod too received tuition from him, but without deriving much benefit from it.

'Reicha's teaching was essentially contrapuntal (as shown by his various books, among which the most significant are the "Traité de Haute Composition Musicale" of 1824 and the "Traité de Mélodie" of 1814).

'A Czech by birth, nurtured on the folk-music of his country, he was fully aware of the possibilities of the modal scales, and would teach his pupils to write fugues in a variety of modes (it is interesting to note that he also suggested the use of quarter-tones).

'Franck worked under Reicha for about twenty months. After Reicha's death (May, 1836), Leborne, his successor, continued his tradition, and Franck, under him, made further headway in the arts of counterpoint and construction. It is certainly to Reicha's teaching that many essential characteristics of the works of Franck's maturity should be traced back.'

THE FRENCH AND BRAHMS

In L'Ami du Peuple (May 6), Jean Delaincourt writes:

'French audiences are said to be unfair to Brahms. In German circles and in circles that are under German influences it is sometimes believed that we Frenchmen object to Brahms because his music calls for too great an effort of attention. This is not true. His grandeur wearies us because it strikes us as turgid. We find him tedious at times because he consistently avoids indulgence in relaxation. He was a great inventor of melodies, but he never rests content with melodies; he must stretch them and drape them in heavy folds. To his creations he gives false dimensions, making them appear laboured, but not actually expanding them. He arranges, he repeats, but he never makes real headway. His misfortune was that he was born in a time of great symphonists, and believed that salvation was not to be found except in their wake. He has written impressive things; but often he irritates us by being untrue to himself and borrowing an idiom alien to his nature in order to serve gods that are not really his.'

THE DATE OF ORAZIO VECCHI'S BIRTH

In the April Rassegna Musicale, Gino Roncaglia mentions the recent discovery at Modena of the baptismal certificate of Orazio Vecchi. The baptism took place on December 6, 1550. His birth must have taken place a very few days earlier. His earliest work, a four-part madrigal, was published in 1566, and his famous 'Amphiparnasso' in 1594.

STRAVINSKY

The April Auftakt contains three articles on Stravinsky: 'Structural processes in Stravinsky's music,' by Igor Gleboff; 'The pianoforte in Stravinsky's art,' by M. Druskin; and 'Stravinsky's influence on contemporary music,' by Boris Asafiev. The last-named esteems that:

'"Petrushka" does away with the static element that characterised impressionistic music, and exercised a good deal of influence in this respect. Soon after its appearance the "lore of the streets" began to play a part in works by other composers (Casella, Rieti, Satie, Auric, Hindemith).

'The dynamic quality of the "Rite of Spring" is purely Russian, and could not be assimilated by Western composers. However, it has exercised a measure of influence. Stravinsky's latest works are not specifically Russian in idiom. They are written in a kind of musical Esperanto, for the reason that the composer has eliminated all elements which might divert the attention of listeners from the kinetic and dynamic properties of his music. A similar tendency is noticeable in many works by other composers of to-day; its originator is undoubtedly Stravinsky.'

MOUSSORGSKY'S ÆSTHETICS

In the May Musik, Igor Gleboff writes:

'Moussorgsky's outlook excluded both abstract, merely formal æsthetics and hedonism. He disliked vagueness, and considered that there should be no wall between emotional content and musical form. Emotional experiences were valuable to him only so far as they carried ethical and social significance. He must have been very much influenced by Tchernyshevsky's book, "The æsthetic relation of art to reality," published in 1855. He held that the rights of the artist intent on expressing live emotions were above all restrictions. He had a very inquiring mind, eager to deal with emotions that had not been dealt with before. He believed that art must be constantly moving, concrete, and accessible. His imagination went straight for the situations in which the life of the human soul stands most fully and most forcibly revealed.'

LISZT'S 'FAUST-SYMPHONIE'

In Musique (May 15), Vladimir Jankelevitch submits Liszt's 'Faust-Symphonie' to a careful and enthusiastic analysis:

'Here, Liszt no longer follows the method of antithesis illustrated in "Mazeppa," "Tasso," or "Hunnenschlacht." On the contrary, he resorts to organic development. The Symphony is founded on six themes which work in co-operation and react upon one another, the result being a wealth of significant variety, and perfect co-ordination.'

ROLAND-MANUEL ON SATIE

In Le Guide du Concert (May 24), Roland-Manuel says of Erik Satie:

'I admired him from the outset, and still admire him, because he was one of the very few human beings whom no magic can blind, and who immediately see in any new departure in art the latent weakness, the germ of decay whose presence admirers do not suspect, but which sooner or later will assert itself. Satie was against Wagner in 1885, against Debussy in 1908, against Ravel during the war, against the "six" just before his death. This is altogether admirable.'

BELGIAN 'SYNTHETIST' COMPOSERS

In the Revue Musicale Belge (April 20), José Bruyr introduces a group of seven young Belgian composers who style themselves 'Synthetists,' and whose desire, apparently, is to steer clear of 'official' routine and of the exaggerations and narrowness of contemporary cliques. They are Maurice Schoemaker, Marcel Poot, Dejoncker, Strens, Bernier, Otlet, and Brenta.

A BIBLIOGRAPHY OF ITALIAN THEATRES

In the April Bolletino Bibliografico Musicale begins the publication of a bibliography of works in which references to the activities of Italian theatres may be found. The compiler is Guido Bustico. The list he provides should prove invaluable to an author wishing to write a history of Italian theatres—which has never yet been done.

UNPUBLISHED LETTERS OF SPONTINI

The May Musica d'Oggi contains eight hitherto unknown letters of Spontini.

M.-D. CALVOCORESSI.

The Musician's Bookshelf

'Beethoven the Creator.' By Romain Rolland. Translated by Ernest Newman.

[Gollancz, 30*s*.]

This book both lifts the reader up and casts him down. It is an unwieldy mass of illuminative criticism, poetic insight, over-statement, and sentimentality. It seems an odd thing to be compelled to say about a book by so eminent a writer, but over and over again some more than usually purple patch reminds us of the advice given to young writers concerning passages that they regard as fine writing: 'Cut them out.' Mr. Arnold Bennett, in his Evening Standard review of the book, even went so far as to suggest that Mr. Newman should have pruned as well as translated. But this is surely to throw overmuch responsibility on to a translator's already burdened shoulders. Mr. Newman has served Rolland well in this matter, for some of the more sentimental passages, given a less balanced and astringent translator, would have slopped over. (We can visualise Mr. Newman negotiating the juicier samples with his tongue in his cheek.)

One thing he might have urged on the author or publisher for the comfort of the reader, i.e., a more practical and comfortable method of disposing of the author's second thoughts and supplementary references. Rolland is an old offender in this way. Several of his earlier books are overburdened with footnotes to such an extent that the primary matter is sometimes submerged. An overdose of footnotes is bad, but they are at least under the reader's eye. Here, the author dumps all his extra matter at the end of the book. There are 391 notes, and they fill about a hundred pages—about a quarter of the book. As other appendices account for a further seventy pages, the disproportion with the main body of the book is absurd. Many of the notes are of great value and interest, but most of them could have been included in the text. On some pages the reader finds himself no fewer than six times bidden to turn to the end of the book, and often this interruption yields no more than a tiny scrap of information or a mere date. For example, on p. 40 we read that 'in his [Beethoven's] day, people thought it monstrous that this young man should regard himself the equal of a Goethe and a Handel (26).' We therefore hunt up Note 26, about three hundred pages farther on, and read, 'Ignaz von Seyfried.' If Seyfried had to be quoted as the authority for the statement on p. 40, why should the reader be compelled to interrupt himself thus? The name might easily have been included in brackets after the reference, or at the foot of the page. A similar disregard for the reader's comfort is shown in other ways. To begin with, the book is far too big and heavy. With thinner paper, narrower margins, and a less imposing type it might have been got into quite a convenient size. Actually it is a good deal bigger and heavier than a volume of 'Grove.' The work may thus be said to suffer from elephantiasis as well as appendicitis. There is perhaps some fitness in this, for the bloated production is not ill-suited to a book so tumid in style.

These grumbles are not merely captious. The public should be encouraged to read books about music, and any method calculated to put them off rather than bring them on calls for frankness.

The book is a pen-portrait and a critical study rather than a biography. It deals roughly with the period covered by the 'Eroïca' and 'Leonora,' and analyses penetratingly the Symphony, the 'Appassionata,' 'Moonlight,' and Waldstein Sonatas, and the opera. Rolland gives copious musical examples, makes liberal use of the sketch-books, and in a remarkable way does show us the growth of a masterpiece. In fact, we pay the highest possible tribute to his informed enthusiasm and its infectious power when we say that it is able to survive his verbiage.

We are glad to see him putting in a good word for the earlier sonatas. He holds that the tendency to-day is to under-estimate Beethoven's first manner. Beethoven himself is partly responsible; 'the cathedrals the old master erected in Op. 106, Op. 110, and Op. 111 have thrown their vast shadow over the earlier buildings. But it would be a profound error to ignore the profound originality of these. To say, as is the habit nowadays, that they are only a prolongation or an imitation of the art that preceded them, the forms and spirit of which they paraphrase, to say that in them Beethoven is still under the influence of the style galant of Philipp Emanuel Bach, Haydn, and Mozart, and that these first twenty-two sonatas are, as a whole, below the best works of the composers of the preceding period, is to forget the upheaval they wrought in the mind of the generation that heard them for the first time, the furies and transports that greeted them, the ostracism meted out to them by those who were in bondage to the older style, and the ardent enthusiasm they invoked in the young.' And he goes on to tell the story of Moscheles discovering the 'Pathétique' Sonata, secretly copying the work because he could not afford to buy it. Recitalists who overplay Opp. 110 and 111 should turn more frequently to the early sonatas. Judging even No. 1 in comparison with all those of Haydn and Mozart (and in fairness forgetting Beethoven's latest examples), we are bound to see how great an advance it shows in almost every way.

Probably few readers will agree with all the eulogistic passages in the chapter on the sonatas, but it has to be admitted that M. Rolland manages to communicate much of his fervour to his readers, and to send them back to their well-thumbed sonata volume with eyes and ears more widely opened than before.

The first of the appendices deals with Beethoven's deafness. The author will have nothing to do with the now generally-accepted theory as to the cause of Beethoven's infirmity. He appeals to Dr. Marage, 'who has specialised for thirty years in the study of hearing and its variations, and, since 1900, has observed thousands of cases of deafness.' Marage went very thoroughly into the question of Beethoven's deafness, but was apparently content to ascertain the nature rather than the cause of it. Rolland therefore questioned him, and as a result of their correspondence they agree that the true source must be sought for in Beethoven's brain. Thus Marage:

> 'The subjects who develop the form of deafness that begins with the loss of the higher sounds are generally overstrained intellectuals. . . . All the functions are normal until the moment of the appearance of the buzzings and the deafness. Until then, Beethoven's hearing had been remarkably fine. Now, an organ that is hypersensitive is the more easily attacked by a malady. . . . Beethoven's inner ear and auditory centres, that were hypersensitive, subjected to intense labour, and overwrought, became congested. . . .'

Rolland says that he himself, when studying the creative genius of Beethoven, had been struck by the 'furious concentration' which characterises it, and that factor is more marked in him than in any other composer of his epoch. Rolland likens the effect of this concentration to hypnosis, and compares it with the Indian Yoga. He adds:

> 'It was not at hazard that I employed this word "Yoga" three, four, or five times in the course of my study. During the course of the present year my labours have brought me into contact with some of the greatest of the contemporary Indian minds that have practised Yoga, notably the extraordinary Ramakrishna, that incomparable master of religious contemplation, and his great disciple Vivekananda. I had read their strangely precise description of all the degrees of this Yogist concentration, and of the physiological and moral effects of what they call the rising, in the canals of the body, of the Kundalini Sakti (the essence of energy). But they know the dangers of it, through having, like Ramakrishna, escaped them by a miracle; and they warn their disciples of these dangers. They forbid them to surrender themselves to Yoga at hazard and without an inward necessity; they know well that these exercises in passionate and boundless concentration always conduct to the brink of cerebral apoplexy or of mental alienation. Some of these adepts have come out of their spells of Yoga with eyes red and bleeding, "as if eaten by ants."'

Marage agrees with Rolland's suggestion. He says:

> 'The cause of Beethoven's deafness seems to me to be the congestion of the inner ear and the auditory centres—a congestion due to his furious concentration, his terrific fixity of idea, as you so well express it. Your comparison with the Indian Yoga seems to me to be very exact.'

There will always be difference of opinion on this subject, but the Rolland-Marage solution seems to be at least as probable as the commonly accepted one, and far more comfortable for the Beethoven worshipper.

However much we may dispute concerning the cause of Beethoven's deafness, we shall all be in agreement as to its result. Probably this is a point that has only recently been recognised. Rolland says: 'Beethoven's genius (I ought to say his demon) produced his deafness. Did not the deafness in its turn make the genius, or at all events aid it?' Marage points out that the curious type of deafness from which Beethoven suffered, although it cut him off from the outer world, had the advantage of:

> '. . . maintaining his auditory centres in a state of constant excitement, producing musical vibrations and hummings that he sometimes perceived with the utmost intensity. If it suppressed the external vibrations it augmented the internal.'

To which Rolland adds:

> 'It may be then that the deafness endowed his palette with new colours and gave him an auditory exaltation that must indeed have often been painful, tyrannical, besetting, but that also may have often been accompanied by euphoria. Subjects attacked by labyrinthitis frequently hear lovely instrumental and vocal melodies that fill them with delight, but which, try as they will to fix them, they cannot retain. Do we not recognise Beethoven chasing his hallucinations across the fields and through the streets?'

This theory of inner music may be far-fetched, but what seems to be certain is a point with which neither Rolland nor Marage are concerned apparently, that is, the great help Beethoven's deafness must have been to him as an aid to concentration and as a shield from outward distraction. Are there not composers in this noisy, distracting age who would welcome temporary loss of hearing? It is in fact one of the deficiencies in our physical make-up that we cannot close our ears with the ease and completeness with which we can close our eyes, and yet remain awake and alert.

The two other appendices deal with a Beethoven sketch-book of 1800, and 'The Brunswick Sisters and their Cousin of the "Moonlight."'

The illustrations are a valuable part of the work. There are thirty of them, mostly full-page plates beautifully reproduced, and many seem to be appearing for the first time. Of engrossing interest are such plates as those giving the general view of Vienna, the Kohl Markt, Vienna, &c., in Beethoven's time.

In a note to the reader, Rolland promises further studies on similar lines. They will be eagerly awaited. But with all good will we suggest that the forthcoming books shall be produced with a little more consideration for the comfort of the reader (and incidentally the demand on his pocket). Rolland has it in him to write a great critical book; it is a pity that he seems in this instance to have been content to turn out one that is bulky rather than great.

'The Theories of Claude Debussy.' By Leon Vallas; translated from the French by Maire O'Brien.

[Oxford University Press, 6*s.* 6*d.*]

Perhaps the word 'theories' is less happy than 'ideas' would have been as a translation of the original French 'Les Idées.' 'Theories' suggests an elaborate mental process that was certainly not the distinguishing mark of the essays by Debussy on which this book is built. That was, in fact, their main charm. They were excellent journalism, but no more. Debussy collected many of his critical articles, and after his death they were published in book form under the title, 'Monsieur Croche, Antidilettante.' An English translation of this book appeared in 1927, and was noticed in these columns. Some of the chapters from the book also appeared in the Musical Times, translated by Mrs. Liebich in 1918.

Mr. Vallas lays out his matter in nine chapters dealing with musical education; the definition of music as a free art; French music and Nationalism; the works of Wagner; foreign music, &c. His method is to expound Debussy's attitude on various points, using frequent but generally brief quotations from Debussy's journalistic writings as text and evidence. The method leads to interesting results, though perhaps Debussy would have been not well pleased to find so much made of so little at times. The quotations have the effect of sending the reader back to 'Monsieur Croche.' Certainly Debussy wielded a pungent pen, and never more so than when writing about Wagner. He began by being an enthusiastic Wagnerite, and in 1903 he recalled in Gil Blas the 'Parsifal' performance in 1889 at which he had been present. '1889! Delightful period, when I was madly Wagnerian. Why am I no longer so?' And he admits that he was a Wagnerian 'to the point of forgetting principles of the simplest civilities.' It may be said that when he became anti-Wagnerian he again forgot those same principles. Yet behind all his bitterness there is sound criticism, and much that will probably find increasing support as time goes on. For example, although in the passage about to be quoted he was mainly influenced by his dislike of Wagner's influence on French music, there is much in it that will meet with general agreement:

> 'Wagner's genius is certainly unquestionable. . . . It is his drama above all that is false from our French point of view. The idea of spreading one drama over four evenings! Is this admissible, especially when in these four evenings you always hear the same things? The characters and the orchestra pass on the same themes in turn to one another, and then comes the "Twilight of the Gods," which is again a résumé of what you have already heard. I repeat that all this is inadmissible for those who love clarity and conciseness.'

Later we find him speaking of the 'Ring' as a 'musical Bottin'—the French equivalent of 'Kelly's Directory.' Above all he was exasperated by the Leit-motiv system. After a performance at Covent Garden of 'the entire "Kelly's Directory"' in 1903, he wrote in Gil Blas:

> 'It is hard to imagine the state to which the strongest brain is reduced by listening for four nights to the "Ring." . . . It is worse than obsession. It is possession. You no longer belong to yourself. You are but a Leit-motiv moving in an atmosphere of tetralogy. No ingrained habit of courtesy will in future prevent us from hailing our fellow-beings by the cries of the Walkyries: "Hoyotoho! Heiah! Hoyohei!" Isn't it gay! "Hoyohei!" What will the newsboys say! . . . . How unbearable these people in skins and helmets become by the fourth night! . . . Remember, they never appear without the accompaniment of their accursed Leit-motiv. Some of them even sing it! Which suggests a harmless lunatic who, on presenting his visiting-card, would declaim his name in song.'

He is amusing too concerning the Wagner menagerie. His strictures, however, were mostly directed against Wagner the dramatist. His admiration of the music was expressed on several occasions. For example:

> 'Let me show you that there is ardent beauty in the "Tetralogy." In moments of tedium, when one really does not know whether to blame the music or the drama, passages of unforgettable beauty suddenly appear and silence all criticism. . . . It is irresistible as the sea. Sometimes it lasts but a moment, often longer.'

And concerning 'Parsifal' he was enthusiastic. 'It is,' he says:

'. . . an admirable proof of the futility of formulas—a magnificent contradiction of the "Ring." In "Parsifal," the last effort of a genius before whom one must perforce bow, Wagner tried to be less authoritative towards music; it breathes with greater ease. There is no longer the nervous breathlessness entailed by the pursuit of the sickly passion of a Tristan; the infuriated cries of an Isolde; or the grandiloquent commentary of an inhuman Wotan. In all Wagner's music nothing attains to more serene beauty than the Prelude to the third Act of "Parsifal" and the entire Good Friday episode.'

And he goes on to say that the work is 'one of the finest monuments of sound ever erected to the indestructible glory music.' One could wish he had given his opinion on the 'Mastersingers,' surely the ripest and best—because the most human—of all Wagner's works.

Readers would imagine that Chauvinism was the basis of Debussy's attitude towards some works of Beethoven, and especially his gibes at the 'Pastoral' Symphony, did we not find him expressing an enthusiastic admiration for Bach. As to the 'Pastoral'; after Weingartner had given an exceedingly detailed and over-precise performance, Debussy wrote that the work had been conducted 'with the care of a meticulous gardener. It was so neatly cleared of caterpillars that it gave the impression of a landscape varnished with a brush, the gentle undulation of the hills being represented by plush at ten francs a metre, and the trees crimped with curling tongs.' Even ten years after having written the above he could still poke fun at the work. 'A little more,' he wrote, 'and we should have smelt the cow-shed!' Afterwards, however, Debussy felt he might be misunderstood, so he pointed out that he was not wanting in respect to Beethoven. 'No man is expected to write only masterpieces; and if the "Pastoral" Symphony is classed as such the term loses force when applied to his other works.' On the whole, Debussy's attitude towards the great masters was that which should be adopted by all. He said one day:

'I refuse to admire them [Beethoven and Wagner] en bloc because I have been told that they are Masters! That, never! In my opinion, the attitude that people adopt towards Masters nowadays is unpleasantly servile. If a dull page annoys me, I insist on my right to say so, whoever its author may be.'

And that he could be generous in his admiration let this last quotation show:

'Genius can, of course, dispense with taste; of this Beethoven is an example. Mozart, on the other hand, his equal in genius, has, in addition, the most delicate taste. Take the work of J. S. Bach, that benevolent god to whom musicians should offer a prayer before setting to work, so that they may be preserved from mediocrity. We shall seek in vain for one fault of taste in all that vast amount of work in which we constantly find things which might have been written yesterday, from the capricious arabesques to that outpouring of religious feeling for which we have so far no better expression.'

It is pleasant to read, too, his generous tribute to composers so widely apart as Weber and Franck. Mr. Vallas's book is one that holds the reader in an unexpected degree. The explanation is, no doubt, that good criticism (despite all that the anti-critics say) makes very interesting material. Moreover, no man of Debussy's standing, with so pungent a gift for expression, can be other than interesting. It should be added that the translation is more than merely adequate.

'Beethoven.' By Edmond Vermeil.
'Wagner.' By René Dumesnil.
[Rieder, Paris, 1929: 18 francs each vol.]

These are the first two volumes of a series of monographs which are certain to prove most attractive to the musical public at large, being plentifully and beautifully illustrated. Each volume contains ninety-six pages of text and sixty plates. Considering the standard of production, and the fact that the price works out at a shade under three shillings, these volumes may be described as remarkably good value. M.-D. C.

PIANOFORTE

Those who have admired Aubyn Raymar's brilliant playing of his arrangement of the Mozart Fantasia in F minor will be glad to know that this transcription is now published by the Oxford University Press. The Fantasia is the one generally associated with Best's organ arrangement, but written originally for a clockwork instrument. Two such works were commissioned at the end of Mozart's life, and both are thoroughly representative of his power at its fullest. It is not too much to say that the Andante which forms the middle section of this present Fantasia is one of his loveliest ideas, and that the whole work, in Aubyn Raymar's arrangement, forms an important addition to the pianist's répertoire. The transcription is particularly interesting; full and imaginative use is made of modern keyboard resources, but there is never any suspicion of virtuoso writing, and the arranger is almost austere in the way he keeps his work to the spirit and letter of the original. When the arrangement was produced two years ago a Times writer commented upon the way in which the original purpose of the Fantasia seemed to stand out in Aubyn Raymar's performance of the work—a very suggestive piece of criticism in the light of the arrangement as it now appears. The transcription can be most warmly commended to pianists having the necessary equipment. The Fantasia has long been known as one of the noblest things in the organist's répertoire; it has also been familiar as a pianoforte duet. It may now well become indispensable to solo pianists.

A number of additions are made to the Clarendon Pianoforte Series edited by John Ireland and published by the Oxford University Press. Howells's 'Gadabout' is a witty and vivacious thing, but more than that has gone to its making. One soon sees it to be closely knit in its thought and construction; and this is the reason why it should wear well. Very brilliant and sparkling in effect again is Harold Rutland's Toccata. A good toccata is an easy thing to begin, but a very difficult thing to continue; so many toccatas lose their interest after the first few rockets have been let off. It is the coherence and aptness of pp. 2 and 4 that mark off this present work. The impulse is felt throughout the movement, from a good beginning to a really brilliant finish. Three Preludes by Dorothy Howell, published separately, are notable for their fluency and the ease of their manner. But there is little more than this, little personality or intensity, except in the short F minor work, which has a sincerity and depth which the other numbers lack. These issues are all in the Clarendon series.

Murdoch's are the publishers of Arnold Bax's 'Pæan,' a passacaglia based on a vigorous four-note figure and elaborated with all Bax's facility of colour. The music is dramatic, and perhaps more orchestral than pianistic in style, but effective enough; to some its triumphant eloquence may seem turgid and verbose; others will call it powerful.

From Chester comes the Valse from Stravinsky's 'Histoire du Soldat,' which may have more effect in its orchestral than in the pianoforte version. It couldn't have less. Paul de Maleingreau's 'Berceuse d'après-midi' has an attractive lilt, but is distinctly thin. P. Perkowski's 'Four krakowiaki' are vivid, and have some original touches of colour. The short No. 3 is particularly attractive.

Caroline Maude's 'In modo antico,' a Suite for pianoforte, published by Stainer & Bell, consists of a Prelude and five dances. The style ranges from that of a clumsy Bach invention in the Prelude to that of a somewhat listless Edward German in the Gavotte. It is lack of any definite style or personality that spoils this music. The composer has some pleasant ideas, and can write a flowing phrase, but one never knows whether the next bar is to be like Bach, like Handel, or like Chaminade. 'Giga,' which ends the Suite, is probably the most spontaneous and the best number.

SONGS

Three Irish folk-songs, with words by P. W. Joyce, are arranged by Sir Hamilton Harty and published by the Oxford University Press. The tunes are well worth treatment, especially the second, called 'The Fairy King's Courtship,' which is a beauty. Sir Hamilton Harty uses the 'full' method of arrangement, clothing the tunes with a rich beauty of sound that is apt to cloy. Needless to say, the settings are thoroughly effective, but the tunes themselves might have had more chance if they had been more allusively treated. The last song, 'The game played in Erin-go-bragh,' is a brilliant and amusing thing, with a welcome lightness of texture which gives great life to its movement. It would be worth a lot to hear Plunket Greene sing it.

From the same Press, published separately, are three Troubadour songs: 'Winter,' 'Serenade,' and 'The Return of Summer,' by W. Arundel Orchard. A vividness of feeling about the words gives these works effect even when the music is uncertain in touch. 'Winter' does not hang together, but attains one or two suggestive atmospheric effects. 'Serenade' is almost an essay in the Wagnerian manner. Most successful as a whole is the freshness and sturdy vigour of 'The Return of Summer.' Peter Warlock makes a beautiful thing of Wyatt's 'And wilt thou leave me thus?' At first one is inclined to wonder whether the music is not too sophisticated for the poem, but poetry could not well be more self-conscious than this, whose every word is artifice, and words and music are in reality very well matched.

This Press also publishes Robin Milford's Op. 15, two Goldsmith songs, 'An Elegy on Mrs. Mary Blaize' and 'An Elegy on the Death of a Mad Dog.' High-spirited, amusing settings, both of them, and light-handed enough to let the words have full effect. In conjunction with the University of Wales Press—for the National Council of Music—the Oxford University Press publishes David Evans's 'Maesaleg,' a very simple ditty. If this is the sort of thing a National Council publishes, Welsh music must be in a very poor way indeed. It is often difficult to believe the travellers' tales about Welsh musicianship when one hears the efforts of their swell singers, and now that some of their music is being published the myth is even further exposed.

A very welcome issue is that in single form of Butterworth's 'Loveliest of Trees'—certainly one of the loveliest of songs. Augener is the publisher, and the range is mezzo-soprano or baritone; the song is suitable for a man or a woman. Competition selectors might well use it, but it must be for advanced classes. Cramer issues Schubert's 'Night-Violets,' with an English translation by J. Smallwood Winder. And Novello's publish a topical version of 'Here's a Health unto His Majesty,' with new words by A. P. Graves and music arranged by A. C. Mackenzie.

One of the most interesting of this month's songs is Ernest Bullock's setting for voice, violin, and pianoforte of Padraic Gregory's 'Padric the Fiddler.' Even those of us who have had about as much as they can stand of Irish fiddlers will welcome a song so quiet, subtle, and musicianly as this. There is a real sense of poetry in the music, and at the same time a firmness of touch which prevents any weakness or hesitancy. The end of the poem is beautifully handled. The violin is an integral part of the song, and not an obbligato. The publishers are Stainer & Bell, and the range mezzo-soprano.

Joseph Williams sends a volume of six songs by Henry Newbolt with music by various composers. Here is a song-book for smoking concerts and the buccaneer type of baritone. The composers represented are Florian Pascal, C. H. Lloyd, and Alan Gray. Lloyd is tuneful and unassuming as always; the volume is chiefly notable for two songs by Alan Gray that are really first-rate in their way. 'The Bold Menelaus' is one, with a good swinging chorus, and 'Admiral Death' is the other. Florian Pascal sets 'Drake's Drum' and 'There 's a breathless hush in the Close to-night.' These songs are not particularly distinguished, and somehow the war seems to have dealt very hardly with 'Play up, play up and play the game' and all that sort of thing. No doubt it was all perfectly sincere, but since the war it sounds like appalling humbug. T. A.

UNISON

In one cover are 'Tommy Snooks,' a neat little easy song of courtship, by Cecil Sharman, and a two-part arrangement of 'Golden Slumbers,' smooth as silk and rich as cream (Novello).

The Oxford University Press sends the first number of an attractive new series, 'The Clarendon Song Books,' edited by W. G. Whittaker, H. Wiseman, and J. Wishart. There are to be six books in all, and the contents include folk-songs, rounds and canons, nursery rhymes, classical pieces, and modern songs. In the later books are to be given some two-part songs, but those in the present issue are all in unison (apart from the rounds). The classical and modern songs include Schubert's 'Cradle Song,' Schumann's 'Ladybird' and 'To the Evening Star,' Brahms's 'The Smith,' and items by Stanford, Whittaker, and Farjeon. There are canons by Tallis, Caldara, Hauptmann, and Whittaker. Altogether there are thirty-one pieces, none difficult, either vocally or pianistically, and the Staff or Sol-fa edition (pocket size, with tunes and words) costs sixpence only—a very fine bargain. The pianoforte edition is 2*s.* 6*d.* Linen backs for the small copies cost twopence extra, and for the pianoforte copy sixpence extra. For school or club use the more durable form is better.

The Oxford University Press prints for the National Council of Music in Wales the 'New Song Book,' Part 1 of which is to hand (pianoforte edition, 3*s.* 6*d.*; melodies in Staff and Sol-fa, 6*d.*). There are twenty-six pieces, with descants (sometimes two or more accompanying parts), and the songs are not all Welsh, though all have Welsh as well as English words, with the exception of 'Gaudeamus igitur.' An unusual feature is the addition in many of the pieces of a percussion part, which may be thrummed with the fingers, or played by the younger children on any convenient instrument. Most of the pieces are folk-songs, Welsh preponderating, with a sprinkling of Irish and Scots (here sometimes called 'Scotch' and sometimes 'Scottish,' but never 'Scots,' the correct adjective); there are also one or two old popular songs, and songs by Morley, R. Jones, and Schubert. Both these new selections are good. The difficulty nowadays for teachers and club leaders seems to be choosing amongst such a large number of song-books. I think it is wise to get out of the rut of folk-song increasingly. In books of the past art-songs have had too little space, and not always have the best folk-songs been included. The new Clarendon books seem to hold the balance in this way better than does the Welsh book; but that is a matter for personal choice.

New single songs are numerous. Colin Taylor has always something neat and pleasant to say in a musicianly way. Here are three songs by him: 'Pretty Cow,' 'A Child's Prayer,' and 'Grasshopper Green.' The first two are slowish, the last lively. All have a good deal to attend to, as imaginative music should have; and the pianoforte parts, which really count, are pedalled. These songs should certainly be looked at by all who select music (not merely 'material') for youngish children. Norman Demuth's setting of Ben Jonson's 'Echo's Lament of Narcissus' ('Slow, slow, fresh fount') has a delicate impulse and is thoughtfully conceived to second the poetry. It needs a fair amount of experience to teach and sing it well. 'Late Summer' is Arthur Baynon's setting of John Drinkwater's 'Tho' Summer long delayeth.' It moves tranquilly, and its melody does not quite satisfy me, though its mood is fitting. Harry Brook sets Blake's 'The Lamb' with a great many even quavers. I find the rhythm somewhat monotonous, and the tune very pleasant. R. H. Hull takes Wordsworth's 'The Daffodils,' but drops into a commonplace tune. The poem demands something finer. A 'Spring Song,' from Gluck's 'Armida,' is a strong, cheerful piece that Dr. Whittaker has arranged. It is easy. Another 'Old Masters' piece is Schubert's 'Whither?' ('Wohin?'). For this, it will be remembered, a light-fingered pianist is needed, and dexterous singers who can ripple along as gaily as the rill (Oxford University Press).

PART-SONGS FOR CHILDREN'S AND FEMALE VOICES

Two attractive choruses from Handel's opera 'Atalanta' are published separately, under the general title of 'The Fairy Folk.' The first of these ('Now the moon') is quietly graceful, and the second ('Now the glow-worms') is in gavotte time. The lower part in the former descends only to C sharp, and in the latter to B. Felix White goes to T. E. Brown (a poet too little read) for 'Apple-tree,' and finds grace to match that of the writer's thought. This needs fine handling, for all its comparative ease in the exposition of the tunes. It is for S.C. (lowest note A). Dr. Whittaker has arranged an old Cornish May song (from Chappell) under the title of 'Robin Hood and Little John' (soprano, with descant). This is a gaily-striding piece, with some dotted quaver-semiquaver rhythms to negotiate at a good speed. Another similar arrangement of his is 'Gossip Joan,' in easy gavotte style (Oxford University Press).

Ernest Bullock sets the familiar rhyme about Charles, who gave Elizabeth a Dodo, under the title, 'Of a Certain Green-Eyed Monster' (S.S.). The words make this suitable for girls; it would go well in clubs. Dorothy Howell's 'Summer' has words by Mary V. Howell. It is gently aerated, and needs a good sense of phrasing and colouring (S.M.-S.).

W. R. A.

MALE-VOICE

Dr. Sweeting writes broadly expressive music for Cecil Spring-Rice's 'I vow to thee, my country.' The dynamic range is considerable, and the spirit of nobility is well maintained (T.T.BAR.B.). Stanley Wilson's 'Tewkesbury Road' (T.T.B.B.) has words by Masefield (' It is good to be out on the road '). This is a good superior sample of the swinging, breezy, ' wind on the heath, brother,' type of male-voice delight, surely touched off. William Rigby has arranged a Hebridean air, ' Farewell ' (' Sad am I, and sorrow-laden '), for T.T.B.B. This, slow and sustained, needs deep feeling and clean, finely-balanced harmonizing, in order to give the tune its full significance. It is not complex (Stainer & Bell).

Two songs for T.T.B. are transcribed by Peter Warlock. The first, ' From stormy windës,' by Edmund Turges, was composed in 1501 for a royal marriage. It moves slowly, with strong dignity. The other, ' Who shall have my fair lady ? ' is by Fayrfax, and trips brightly, with a dainty bit in triple time, after the normal two in a bar (Oxford University Press). W. R. A.

MIXED VOICES

J. H. Foulds has written ' Three Marching Songs,' with accompaniment for pianoforte or orchestra. The words are adapted from Lytton's ' Rienzi,' and the separate titles are ' Santo Spirito,' ' Lances of the Free,' and ' The Grand Compagnie ' (S.A.T.B.). The second is likely to be the most popular. The last is called a ' Descriptive Chorus,' and I know where that will be most often sung. All three have a little freshness, and choirs that like a genteelly rowdy time now and again might look at them (Paxton).

Percy Fletcher's pretty song ' Bees ' (S.A.T.B.) gives scope for onomatopœic effects, and needs a light, firm use of tongue, lips, and teeth. The tone is on the delicate side, varying from pp to mf (Novello).

It is pleasant to see another remembrance of Ernest Farrar, whom we lost untimely in the war. ' To Daffodils ' (S.A.T.B.) is straightforward, with the touches of personal thought and feeling that we always had from this composer. Choirs that have tried Quilter's charming setting will like to compare this with it, and those that have no music for Herrick's lyric should try this. Rachael Hobday (I hope this is yet another member of the family that we know so well as executants) does well with Shakespeare's ' Willow Song ' (S.A.T.B.) by not attempting too much. There is something chaste and seemly in this. Alfred Wall we know best as a string writer from the North. His ' Soft, soft wind ' (Kingsley) weaves gently, reticently, in a way that attracts one (S.A.T.B.). Percy Judd, in ' A Deserted Home ' (S.A.T.B.), evokes the spirit of days long gone, when present desolation was busy cheer. This composer might worry rather more over his melodies, which sound to me as if he accepted them a little before they had come into the best shape. One of Peter Warlock's new editions is ' Trolly lolly lo,' by Cornysshe (early 16th century). This is a brief, gay, inconsequential ballad, consisting chiefly of the words of the title. It is for S.A.B. (Oxford University Press).

Alec Rowley and his sister Doris write blithely of love's pranks in ' Lack-a-day-me ! ' a song for S.A.T.B. that Church choirs will like to try as a change from their severer labours. Small bodies of other natures can well tackle it. This composer's ' The Shepherds' Queen ' (Ben Jonson) is more contrapuntal, and requires rather more experience in colouring and shading tone, though it is still fairly easy. It, too, will be taken up with pleasure. J. Albert Sowerbutts writes well. His ' Spring ' (Nashe) throws the diatonic discords about with a sure hand, and makes the rhythm live. This is a splendid little S.A.T.B. song for choirs that like to polish detail, and feel the flow of strength in their music. We could do with more by this composer. ' Breathe soft, ye winds,' is best known as an old favourite glee. Here is a S.A.T.B. song upon these words, by W. E. Jacquest, mellifluous and straightforward—very pleasant work that choirs not very far advanced could do agreeably, and that others would like to see also (Stainer & Bell).

Cramer sends a curious piece—Vivian Langrish's arrangement for S.A.T.B. of Bach's Prelude in E flat (No. 7 in Book 1 of the ' Forty-eight '). The pianist plays the first nine bars, and then the choir sings, to ' Ah,' the next portion, the instrument taking up the semiquaver runs later. The work is also scored for orchestra. There seems little point in singing keyboard music merely because it can be done. Are there not enough songs in existence ? And if one must adapt Bach, why not take vocal music ? This sort of thing seems to me to have only a curiosity value.

CHURCH MUSIC

Several new works of considerable interest to choirmasters come from the Oxford University Press. An easy Communion Service in E flat—' Missa de Sancto Albano '—by Healey Willan admirably meets the requirements of the average church choir and may be cordially recommended. ' Lo, round the Throne a glorious band,' by Henry G. Ley, is No. 2 of ' Six Short Anthems for the Seasons of the Church,' set in an extended version for chorus, semi-chorus, and orchestra or organ. It was written for the two hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary of the Festival of the Sons of the Clergy in St. Paul's Cathedral, 1929. Dr. Ley has founded his work on a sturdy old melody by N. Herman (1560), which he has treated in masterly fashion and with a fair amount of elaboration. The setting provides wide scope for a good choir, and with its finely-written organ part should make impressive hearing. Orchestral score and parts may be hired from the publishers, and it should be noted that a shorter version of this anthem is also published.

A setting by C. C. Harwood of ' O Strength and Stay ' is well-written and devotional. It is in four-part harmony throughout, with the tune in the treble, except for a few unison bars in the last verse. The harmony is varied for the different verses, and the middle verse is for unaccompanied singing.

Gordon Slater's setting in E flat of the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis is a strongly-written work, straightforward and not difficult. Also to be commended is a setting in A of the same Canticles by W. Lovelock. The vocal writing is fluent, and there is an excellent free organ part. Both these works are fresh and interesting, and should be examined by choirmasters. Ernest Bullock's admirable short anthem, ' Song in the Valley of Humiliation,' is a worthy setting, bold and direct, of John Bunyan's words commencing ' He that is down needs fear no fall.' A welcome addition to the Oxford Choral Songs from the Old Masters is the popular Aria ' My heart ever faithful,' from Bach's Church Cantata No. 68. It has been arranged and edited by W. G. Whittaker, who supplies some interesting notes on the work. Lastly, from this house comes a short, simple setting of 'Gloria in Excelsis Deo,' by Anne Megarey. It is for female voices (unaccompanied).

N. F. Byng Johnson's Hymn-Anthem, 'Sun of my Soul' (Novello), is a melodious, smoothly-written work, quite easy to sing. It contains a fair amount of optional solo work for soprano, tenor, and bass. H. Scott-Baker's setting of the Te Deum in B flat—composed for the Thanksgiving Services, 1929—is for S.A.T.B., the accompaniment ad lib. An orchestral accompaniment is available if required. The treatment is broad and straightforward, and the work, which is not difficult, should sound effective. One or two phrases, by the way, indicate that the composer is not entirely unacquainted with Stanford's setting in the same key (Novello). Choirmasters might note that Handel's 'Rejoice greatly' is issued separately as No. 71 of Novello's Chorister Series of Church Music for female or boys' voices.

Some further examples of the old Polyphonic School have recently been issued under the editorship of H. B. Collins (Chester). Byrd's Motet 'O Rex Gloriæ,' for five voices, is for the Feast of the Ascension. Another Motet, 'O salutaris Hostia,' also for five voices, is by Thomas Tallis, and is in honour of the Blessed Sacrament. Both these fine works are fairly difficult.

From the Plainsong and Mediæval Music Society, Nashdom Abbey, Burnham, Bucks, come 'An Order for Compline'—admirably produced in every respect—and 'Simple Music for the Holy Communion.' The latter is a handy little book containing Kyrie, Creed (the old traditional melody), Sursum Corda, Sanctus, Benedictus, Agnus Dei, and Gloria in Excelsis—all of course in plainsong notation (voice part only). A few helpful prefatory notes are given. G. G.

SMALL ORCHESTRA

The Oxford University Press has added seven new scores to its excellent 'Oxford Orchestral Series,' edited by Dr. W. G. Whittaker. The editor and 'arrangeur' in every case is Michele Esposito, who has wrestled manfully with the difficulties of adapting a part so that it may be played either by violas or by violins (an octave higher) in default of violas, and adding a flute, bassoon, and, occasionally, timpani ad lib. The music is well chosen. The four pieces of Couperin ('Les moissoneurs,' 'Les Barricades Mistérieuses,' the chaconne 'La Favorite,' and 'L'Aussouienne') lend themselves well to adaptation—almost as well as the Handel Concerto Grosso in B flat and the Mozart Gavotte. The Brandenburg Concerto No. 6, in B flat, stands apart from the rest, as the problem to be solved in this case was of a different order. The original score consists of two viole da braccio, two viole da gamba, 'cellos, and double-basses. Mr. Fuller-Maitland suggests that the Concerto was played as a sextet. Mr. Esposito has brought in violins by the simple expedient of raising the viola da braccio part an octave higher. The arrangement looks well, and the different parts are nicely balanced except at a few bars before D (first movement), where the weight of second violins, first and second violas, 'cellos, and basses is bound to be heavily felt as soon as the first violins leave the E for the A string. As regards bowing marks (fingering has not been attempted), the Handel and Bach are more in keeping with the string-music tradition than the marks in the Couperin works. May I suggest that one of the adapters of the Oxford University Press should consider the expediency of a string arrangement of the slow movement in the E minor Suite for pianoforte and violin which might serve as middle section for the third Brandenburg in G major? I would not dare to urge it without higher authority. But Hans Richter never conducted the Concerto without the inclusion of this, one of Bach's most beautiful slow movements.

F. B.

VIOLIN

It does not usually happen that a piece of music written for either flute or violin will fit in equally with the genius of the two instruments. But this undoubtedly is the case with the Sonata in D of Leonardo Vinci, arranged and edited by Dr. W. G. Whittaker (Oxford University Press). Since fiddlers possess a good repertory of old sonatas it may be a generous act to leave this work for flautists. But those ascending and descending groups of six notes in the first Adagio would make an excellent lesson in bowing and tone-production.

A large number of short, comparatively easy pieces has recently been published—mostly bad. Wilfrid Sanderson's 'Valsette' and 'Pirouette' (Leonard, Gould, & Bolttler) must be excepted. The aim is not very high, but the composer achieves what he sets out to do. F. B.

'FUNERAL ODE': FULL SCORE

A. Krein, the leader of the Jewish National School, though popular in his own country is little known in Europe. This work will hardly add to his laurels. Its plan and conception suggest that it was written under pressure, and to order. It was composed in memory of Lenin, for the tenth anniversary of the Russian Revolution, and consists for the most part of the theme of the 'Internationale'; the harmony is rather commonplace, and the work would not be very effective for voices or orchestra. The introduction, which should be of a sombre character, is without distinction, and so far as the music is concerned, somewhat discordant. One cannot but regret that the composer's great talent should have been expended on a work unworthy of it. Furthermore, the scoring has been carelessly done and cannot sound well (Music Section of the State Publishing Department, Moscow).

'ISCHAVET' ('THE POLAR SEA'): FULL SCORE

G. Nyström, the young Swedish composer, dedicates his first big orchestral composition to Roald Amundsen, the famous Polar explorer. This 'Symphonic Tableau' is permeated with the characteristic Scandinavian spirit, and judging from the title is almost programmatic; and in any case it breathes of the landscape. In justice to the composer it must be said that he has a masterly grasp of the gloomy and grandiose colouring of that landscape, and his symphonic work, as an example of the moribund tone-picture, must occupy an honourable place amongst contemporary compositions. 'Ischavet' displays the composer's robust, fresh, and independent talent. His ideas of orchestral colour, in which the influence of French impressionism is perceptible, are clever and original. He has also been affected to a certain extent by Greig, and perhaps by Wagner. Nyström's harmonic style is on the whole very thick and complicated, and he indulges freely in dissonances; these complex and quite modern harmonies are combined with clear-cut rhythms and often with simple and direct melodies. This composition is agreeably free from artificiality, and is the result of inspiration and not of calculation—Mr. Nyström belongs to the vanishing race who write as the spirit moves them. (The composer, 11, Rue Thibaud, Paris XIVe.)

FOURTH CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE AND ORCHESTRA

A composer such as Rachmaninov is, of course, completely formed, and it would be strange to expect any fresh revelations from him, even after a silence which has lasted for nearly ten years. Moreover, he has long ceased to rank with musicians of innovating tendencies; his sympathies, style, and manner belong to the past, and I cannot say that this has been a bad thing. His latest Concerto is in parts very like the other three, especially the second. It has the same passionate and rather expansive lyricism; the same gloomy and, so to speak, solemnly magnificent pathos; the same austere, profound, and always finely resonant orchestral colouring; and the same masterly pianoforte style which at once reveals the great pianist. The Concerto, however, contains certain features that are novel for Rachmaninov—a greater boldness in the harmonic forms, a more complex tissue, and some new instrumental methods. Rachmaninov is not a modernist; he frankly and honourably refuses to recognise the style and manner of the present day, and in this respect he is almost the only composer who has not in some way or other been beguiled by contemporary influences. I am confident that this Concerto is bound to be severely censured and even ridiculed as old-fashioned by the majority of progressively-minded critics, but gazing into the future, I cannot refrain from expressing the opinion that there will be a return to this music. This will happen when the public and the composers themselves have grown weary of juggling with an originality which has already become stereotyped, and when the waning taste for pungent and unpleasant dissonances has vanished. It is difficult to deny that however antiquated this work may seem, however strange it may sound side by side with Stravinsky and Hindemith, it is great, genuine, very talented, and supremely musical music. (Paris: 'Tair.')

LEONID SABANEEV.

(Translated by S. W. Pring.)

Messrs. Novello have just issued a further set of 'Twenty Short and Easy Pieces for the Organ.' This is the seventh collection of the kind, and like its predecessors it should be of great use to students, and to players in search of moderately difficult voluntaries. The composers represented include Bargiel, Bononcini, Handel, Kullak, Mendelssohn, Merkel, Rheinberger, Wolstenholme, &c.

Gramophone Notes

BY 'DISCUS'

H.M.V.

The mid-May parcel arrived too late for my June notes. It is small, but unusually interesting. The London Symphony Orchestra and Albert Coates give a vivid and well-reproduced performance of Liszt's 'Les Préludes,' a work whose merit is proved by the way it survives the annoying suggestions of 'We won't go home till morning' (D1616-17).

The real plum of the batch, however, is Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for harp, strings, and wood-wind, played by J. Cockerill, the Virtuoso String Quartet, R. Murchie, and C. Draper. This is fine, animated stuff, full of delightful colouring. The performance is all that we expect from so distinguished a set of players, and the work records well. It fills three sides, the Virtuoso party adding for makeweight Frank Bridge's Novelette No. 3, a worthy companion piece to the Ravel (C1662-63). Is there a finer quartet party than the Virtuoso? I can't think of their equal in exuberance and vitality, and there is no lack of finish and delicacy when those qualities are called for.

Here is the Andante Cantabile from Tchaikovsky's D major Quartet, recorded for the umpteenth time. The players are the Budapest Quartet, who give a good performance that would be first-rate but for its being rather too uniformly loud (D1634).

A Paderewski record needs little more than mention. His latest is of Chopin's D flat and A flat Preludes, and will be enjoyed by those who don't object to poorish tone (DB1272).

Those of us who think that the best keyboard instrument for use with strings is the harpsichord are encouraged in our belief by the record of Landowska playing the Minuet from 'Don Giovanni' with strings. This is a rare delight. On the other side she is recorded playing Rameau's 'Le Tambourin'—another first-rate item—and Daquin's 'Le Coucou'—rather too fiercely ('I'll larn you to be a cuckoo!') (DA977).

Finally, Rosa Ponselle in arias from 'Ernani' and 'La forza del destino.' This is brilliant singing and recording that could hardly be bettered (DB1275).

This brings us to the June parcel.

Tchaikovsky, more than most composers, calls for brilliancy and colour. I do not remember hearing him better served in these respects than in the record of his 'Capriccio Italien,' played by the Berlin State Opera Orchestra under Leo Blech. There is also unusual opulence in the matter of power, though it never degenerates into mere noise. Altogether, this is one of the very best orchestral records issued for a long time (D1593).

There are a couple of good examples of light music in Suppé's Overture, 'Morning, Noon, and Night in Vienna,' played by the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra under Robert Heger (C1667); and the Overture to 'The Daughter of the Regiment,' played by La Scala Orchestra of Milan, conducted by Gabriele Sangini (C1654).

A batch of organ records issued some months ago has reached me rather late in the day. I had heard much of the success with which Handel's

B flat Concerto, played by Dr. Ernest Bullock and a string orchestra, had been recorded in Westminster Abbey, but I am bound to say that my expectations were more than realised. The clarity is unusual, and there is an absence of the confusing echo that spoils so many records of fine organ playing. The alternation of string tone and organ diapason is, as we all know, very effective, and it is well realised here. I hope this will lead to further recordings of these popular works of Handel's, not as organ solos but as concertos. The Concerto fills three sides, the remaining space being occupied by some more Handel—a movement in D from the Water Music. From the organ point of view this is even better than the Concerto. The clearness of definition and the rhythmic impulse are extraordinarily good. If all organ playing and recording were like this, the old instrument would soon be of better repute among musicians than is unfortunately the case now (B2890-91).

The other organ record gives us some more Handel. Dr. Henry Ley plays the first movement of the so-called 'Cuckoo and Nightingale' Concerto, with for companion piece the Pastorale from Guilmant's D minor Symphony. The organ is that of St. Margaret's, Westminster. This Handel is also first-rate, though hearing it immediately after the B flat Concerto, I miss the strings. Dr. Ley's playing has all the delightful clearness and rhythmic life that we look for (C1537).

I had heard much of the results achieved by Dr. Malcolm Sargent as conductor of the Royal Choral Society, but I have had no opportunity of hearing the choir sing since he took command. Hence my welcome of four records of the Society's performance of 'Elijah' last autumn. Little, if any, better choral recording than this has been issued. It is difficult to believe that so large a force is engaged, so clean and well-defined are the results. The tone is bright and always musical. At one or two points I thought I detected a hint of the old Royal Choral Society fault of a slight diffidence in the high notes of the sopranos, but such reminders are rare. The attack is surprisingly good. Too often with large choirs one has an impression of the singers gradually getting under way; here they are well on the spot at the start. The numbers recorded are: 'Help, Lord,' 'Yet doth the Lord see it not' (C1668); 'Baal, we cry to thee,' 'Blessed are the men who fear Him' (C1669); 'Behold, God the Lord,' 'Then shall your light break forth' (C1671); 'Be not afraid,' and 'Thanks be to God' (C1670). If I had to express a preference for any one of this fine batch it would perhaps be for C1670, but the choral enthusiast may put the numbers in a hat and chance his luck with confidence.

Folk who still find 'Norma' worth hearing will be pleased with a record of Rosa Ponselle and Marion Telva in a duet from Act 3, accompanied by the Metropolitan Opera House Orchestra conducted by Guilio Setti (DB1276).

Casals is heard in two Spanish dances, one by the inevitable Popper (who is here a little less commonplace than usual), and Granados. His playing is far too good for the music, and makes us wish he would elect to be heard in some standard large-scale work. A special word should be given to the admirable pianoforte accompaniment of Nicolai Mednikoff, whose tone is first-rate (DB1015).

COLUMBIA

First place this month must go to a batch of chamber-music records—those of Franck's Quartet played by the London String Quartet (L2304-09). The hearing of this set has given me keen pleasure from start to finish. I could note little ground for fault-finding anywhere, except perhaps that the closing bars are a trifle tame. Throughout there is abundant variety, free from exaggeration and point-making. I can pay the performance no better tribute than to say that I took off the last disc with a greater admiration than ever for this beautiful work. Superior people may say that Franck is not wearing well. Nevertheless, the fact remains that, unequal as he was, he somehow contrived to leave masterpieces in at least five departments—the violin sonata, the quartet and quintet, the symphony, the two major pianoforte solos, and a good handful of some of the finest organ music ever written. When we remember this we may well forget his disappointing essays. Certainly these records justify the claim of his admirers that for sheer long-sustained beauty of thought and sound, the Quartet has very few equals—perhaps none, for the works that excel it do so rather by virtue of other qualities.

Lalo's Norwegian Rhapsody—brilliant stuff, with not much in it—is excellently played by the Orchestre Symphonique of Paris, conducted by Pierre Chagnon (9707).

Respighi's 'The Pines of Rome' receives the right vivid treatment from the Milan Symphony Orchestra under Lorenzo Molajoli. This is descriptive music, perhaps in rather too detailed a shape for most of us. For example, in No. 3 of the four pieces—a moonlight scene—there is supposed to be heard the singing of a nightingale. Most composers would have been content to indicate this by any one of the familiar orchestral means that have been so long used. Not so Respighi. He must have the real nightingale song, so a gramophone record thereof is included among the orchestral material. It is only poetic justice that the device is less effective than a mere orchestral suggestion would be. The lesson is that composers should credit their hearers with brains and a little fancy (5310-12).

Sir Henry Wood and the Queen's Hall Orchestra give a resounding performance of 'Finlandia.' But when are we to hear some of the other and finer Sibelius music that has lately proved so successful in the concert room? (9655).

Here is a military band record good enough to attract the attention of listeners who do not usually care for this particular medium—the B.B.C. Wireless Military Band, conducted by Walton O'Donnell, playing an arrangement of Debussy's 'Golliwog's Cakewalk,' and the conductor's transcription of the 'Dance of the Tumblers' from Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Snow-maiden.' The Debussy strikes me as being too peppy and over-emphatic generally. This is perhaps inevitable. It may be doubted if any medium will suit this piece so well as the pianoforte. The Rimsky-Korsakov dance is first-rate, and is a good example of the excellent results that may be obtained in transferring music from the orchestra to the military band when discretion is used in the choice, and skill in the process. In its liveliness and precision the playing is a joy (9744).

The Chorus and Orchestra of the Théâtre Nationale de l'Opéra are heard in the 'Soldiers' Chorus' and the 'Fair Scene' from Gounod's 'Faust.' The record is made in the Paris Opera House, and no conductor's name is given. Perhaps he preferred to remain anonymous, for the vocal tone is very hard and the style crude. This kind of operatic chorus-singing may suit France, but it happens to be one of the things we can do far better in this country (9747).

There is a very good sample of organ recording—Commette playing his own Scherzo, in Lyons Cathedral. The music is of the type that organists enjoy, but which cuts little ice with the average listener. The Lyons instrument and surroundings seem to be unusually good for recording purposes (5315).

Player-Piano Notes

ÆOLIAN

Audiographic.—Albert Stoessel has done a really first-rate piece of work in arranging, explaining, and playing the first movement of Beethoven's fifth Symphony. It is good in every way, and will enable even the veriest novice to get on familiar terms with the work. It is to be hoped that the other movements will be treated in like manner (D841). The one other roll in this section is of Chopin's 'Three Ecossaises,' delightfully played by Godowsky, with an introduction by Sir Alexander Mackenzie (D851).

Duo-Art.—Dai Buell gives a lively and rhythmic performance of Liapounov's 'Lesghinka.' The colouring is rich, too—a capital roll (7302).

Schumann's 'Night-Piece' in F (Op. 23, No. 4) is a thing of beauty at any time, but in Paderewski's hands it is a sheer delight and a model of cantabile playing (7262).

Liszt's transcription of Isolde's 'Death Song' is as successful as a pianoforte version of such music can be. Walter Damrosch is the capable pianist (7225).

Palmgren's picturesque 'The Sea' loses none of its effectiveness at the hands of Katharine Goodson (7296).

Metrostyle.—Only two of these have come to hand, but both are good, though not outstanding in musical interest. They are Liszt's 'Soirées de Vienne' (T30432*c*) and Grainger's attractive little 'Handkerchief' Dance (T30431*a*).

Readers will be glad to know that the prices for all rolls, with the exception of the 'Duo-Art,' were considerably reduced on June 1. This should bring them within the compass of modest exchequers. Hand-played rolls are to be discontinued, and all new Song-rolls will be issued under the 'Meloto' label.

We are asked to announce that the lecture-recital at St. Mary Aldermary, by the Rev. William E. Lees, on 'The Use of the Organ in Church,' which was arranged for May 27, had to be postponed, and will take place on July 1, at 6 p.m. Admission is free, without ticket. St. Mary Aldermary is in Queen Victoria Street, opposite the Mansion House Underground station. The series of lectures, of which this is one, has proved to be very successful and well-attended.

Wireless Notes

BY 'ARIEL'

I believe I shall be doing many of my fellow-musicians a good turn by directing their attention to the programmes played by the Wireless Military Band from 2LO. Until recently I was inclined to give them a miss on general principles. Like most musicians, I was put off by the fact that the bulk of the music consisted of transcriptions, and sometimes by the nature of the vocal items that provided relief. Moreover, there is a natural prejudice against military bands—a prejudice not without foundation. The programmes of such bands at holiday resorts have long been made up of fourth-rate music rigidly performed, and the medium has inevitably suffered in prestige. My recent comments on the B.B.C. Wireless Military Band have brought me some correspondence, and as a result I have sampled a good many programmes, and have also had the pleasure of a chat with the conductor, Mr. Walton O'Donnell. Being struck by the soundness of the policy behind the B.B.C. band programmes, I take this opportunity of making it more widely known. That policy owes its origin to the fact that just as the average trained musician listens to orchestral and chamber music and switches off when the military band begins, so a vastly larger proportion of listeners tune in for military band music and fight shy of orchestral and chamber music. Now the published repertory of the military band is notoriously weak. The B.B.C., loth to perpetuate the existing repertory, has therefore set out to make a new and better one. If our composers would rise to the occasion and write first-rate military band music there would be rejoicing at Savoy Hill. But as they apparently prefer to write orchestral music which is rarely if ever heard, rather than military band music which would be performed to millions, the B.B.C. has no option but to set about transcribing on a grand scale. The bulk of this work is being done, and done most ably, by Mr. Gerrard Williams, a musician whose skill and taste have long been recognised. The choice of works for this purpose is generally good. Occasionally I feel that a bad shot has been made, but a few slips of the kind are inevitable, and we may be sure that when performance has proved the shot to be a bad one the work will be heard no more. I have lately heard some transcriptions that in interest and effect have made a very near approach to the orchestral original.

Here, then, musicians have a new source of pleasure in the weekly programmes. It is true that this pleasure may sometimes be of an intermittent nature. As I hinted above, the vocal items are apt to fall below the instrumental in quality and interest, and are too often performed by the members of the wobbling sisterhood. The inclusion of weak vocal items may deter musicians from switching on during the Wireless Military Band programmes. Failing a supply of good singers and worthy songs it might be well to draw on instrumental solos for relief. A good bit of fiddling or pianoforte-playing, for example, would provide an excellent foil to the wind instruments. After all, it is as important (perhaps even more important) to wean band enthusiasts from indifferent songs as from trivial band pieces.

However, perhaps a reform of this kind must come slowly. Anyway, here is a sample of the band music from a programme announced for June 25: two Norwegian Dances, Grieg; Overture, 'Russlan and Ludmila,' Glinka; Characteristic Suite, Op. 9, Glazounov; and Stanford's first Irish Rhapsody. Here is another programme which was down to be played a couple of days earlier: Massenet's Dramatic Overture, 'Phedre'; Fantasia from Delibes's 'Coppelia'; a Russian Dance, by Lehar; Liadov's 'Musical Snuffbox'; a Suite from Coleridge-Taylor's 'Othello'; and Six of Brahms's Waltzes, arranged by Gerrard Williams. It is not easy to over-estimate the importance of thus giving a multitude of non-orchestral listeners an opportunity of hearing a great store of excellent music they would otherwise miss. Recent transcriptions have included some Bach, and movements from Beethoven's Symphonies. I think there is a big field waiting here. The best movements from Handel's Organ Concertos would also transcribe well. The success of Holst's arrangement of Bach's 'Gigue' Fugue showed that many of the more tuneful and attractive of Bach's organ works could be turned into admirable band pieces. In fact, for the type of fugue that makes its effect mainly by animation, and that depends very little on emotional or intellectual appeal, the military band is an even better medium than the orchestra. Its comparatively dry tone, and its great possibilities in the matters of clarity and precision, make it very suitable for rapid polyphonic work. Another feature of the Wireless Band programmes is the considerable number of really excellent works that have been rescued from undeserved oblivion. Specially attractive have been some old operatic overtures by Rossini, Méhul, &c.—tuneful things of which even the titles have been almost forgotten. Altogether this military band policy of the B.B.C.'s is likely to prove a most useful bit of propaganda on behalf of good music.

The programme of music by young English composers, on June 3, was a brilliant success. I shall be surprised if it did not convince multitudes of listeners that we have some really young men (all those represented were on the right side of forty, and several are still in the twenties) who are pretty certain to do even bigger things in the future. I was particularly struck by William Walton's Sinfonia Concertante; and Constant Lambert's 'Pomona' turned out to be quite as delightful as I had been led to expect from my acquaintance with the pianoforte duet version. There was irony in the fact that the least satisfactory work seemed to be the Suite of Lennox Berkeley—a composer who (we are told) lives in France because he feels that England is not sufficiently interested in musical progress. The Suite contains little that is original, and depends so much upon purely orchestral effects that its interest soon peters out. Mr. Berkeley must forget a good deal of French and Russian music if he is to do anything worth while. Hely Hutchinson's skit on jazz was a first-rate piece of musical humour, adroitly scored, and in every way making Gershwin's 'Rhapsody in Blue' and similar 'symphonised syncopation' seem very small beer indeed. On an evening a week or two later we heard a further work by Constant Lambert—a piece called, rather curiously, 'Music for Orchestra.' It showed an admirable command of polyphonic writing, and was a really brilliant affair, with fewer discords of the fierce type than might have been expected. I must confess that the first work of Lambert's that came my way—the 'Romeo and Juliet' Ballet—disappointed me. It struck me as being too imitative, and imitative of a rather weak school that was fashionable about ten years ago. His later works show real individuality, and he and Walton should go far. I hope the B.B.C. will give us further programmes of this kind. Clearly the concert-room has no opening for our younger men just now, though somehow it manages to give a show to feeble works from abroad.

We have had welcome performances of the greatest and latest of Beethoven's String Quartets during recent weeks. I suggest, however, that a solitary performance or a couple at long intervals is not sufficient. After all, even those of us who attend chamber concerts in London get few opportunities of hearing such works, and it is obvious that the average wireless listener needs to hear them more than once or twice a year. I believe that there would be a welcome for two or three performances in a month of any one of these works. The policy of repetition is one that needs courage. The tendency at all concerts—including broadcast—is to repeat overmuch the popular and easily-understood works, and to fight shy of more than an occasional performance of the indubitable masterpieces that have yet to make their way with the average listener. Still, chamber-music enthusiasts have much to be thankful for. The programmes lately have given us not only the E minor, A minor, and 'Harp' Quartets of Beethoven; we have had also a week of Haydn's String Quartets and a week of Mozart in the 'Foundations of Music' series—real oases in these noisy, hurried days.

Apropos of repetitions, many listeners no doubt welcomed the second performance within a few months of Mendelssohn's Octet. Any kind of octet performance is rare; this was refreshing as well, both because of the fine playing and the quality of the music. Listening to it on June 16, I was more than ever astounded that such a work could be written in boyhood—surely an even more miraculous masterpiece than the 'Midsummer Night's Dream' music that came a few years later. What a start for a composer's career! What might he not have done later had he been blessed with a reasonable amount of poverty and hardship! The real tragedy was not that he died young, but that he was born lucky and rich.

We have received, too late for insertion in our correspondence columns, a letter from the British Federation of Musical Competition Festivals in connection with the Summer School of Chamber Music (Oxford, August 9-17). The letter points out that the number of members—ninety—holds out promise of a highly successful school, but there is a difficulty in the matter of balance. Viola and 'cello players predominate largely—and unexpectedly. The Federation is therefore extending the entry period in the hope that more violinists will come forward. For particulars write to Mr. H. Fairfax Jones, at the Federation Offices, 22, Surrey Street, W.C.2.

Teachers' Department

A MODERN APPROACH TO MUSIC-TEACHING:

VI.—THE PUPIL—WHY DOES HE LEARN MUSIC? SUGGESTIONS FOR AN IDEAL SCHEME

By NORAH H. BORE

Having analysed the two component elements of music, the teacher must turn his attention to the child's side of the problem and co-ordinate this with other aspects of music-teaching.

Why does the average child undertake the study of music—too often calling it 'learning the pianoforte'?

If we consider the matter carefully, it becomes clear that he does so for one of three reasons. There is first of all what may be called the conventional motive. 'Mother said I was to start having music lessons when I was eight years old' is a typical remark representative of an attitude of mind which reduces music to the level of a parlour trick.

Secondly, there is the psychological reason. A is having pianoforte lessons; B dislikes the sense of superiority which this confers on A. She starts learning the pianoforte to rid herself of what she considers an unfair handicap. C is young and sentimental; Miss D, the music mistress, completely realises her ideal of what an adult should be. C naturally contrives to have music lessons with Miss D. Take a further instance: E, after some period of initial drudgery, has discovered that music provides her with a comfortable refuge from the jars of actuality to which she is unable to adjust herself. She therefore uses music as a narcotic, taking refuge in an imaginary world to which music is the magic gateway, through which she may escape the unpleasant jolts and jars of actual life. F has discovered that music is the only sphere in which she can develop any sense of power or mastery. She is a failure intellectually, and her mediocre career at school affords her no healthy outlet for the development of that self-respect which successful achievement generates in all normal beings. Music, for her, is the only saving factor in an otherwise hopeless situation.

It is evident that the teacher must handle types such as these very differently. F should be encouraged to use music freely. E needs to re-adjust her attitude to it if she is to avoid a very real danger.

Lastly, there is the real artistic urge. This it is which drove little Handel to practise in a garret in spite of his father's threat; it made Bach creep downstairs at night to copy out his elder brother's manuscript regardless of the consequence. This is, of course, the ideal incentive and needs no further comment.

Let us pretend that the music teacher's Utopia has become a realised fact. What do we see? Every child of whatever musical ability is given at least one year of general musical training before any specialised work is undertaken. Difficulties of classification which now baffle the teacher have been solved by experimental methods. Easy material, co-ordinated with the play activities of the child, exists to test his musical capacity in pitch, rhythm, musical memory, muscular and motor control, emotional response. The teacher is thus able to group his pupils accurately according to natural endowment, and so avoid the error of expecting more from the child than he is capable of giving. The preliminary course of musical training is the same for all—the rate of progress varies according to individual ability and involves frequent re-grouping.

The general aim of Utopian musical training is education in musical discrimination. In the first years, music is closely co-ordinated with singing, rhythmic movements, free musical expression. Elementary work in pitch, rhythm, memorisation, motor and muscular co-ordination forms an important part of the scheme.

As training proceeds the pupils show varying tendencies, which lead the teacher to estimate their natural musical bent. Re-classification follows according to these different aptitudes.

Training is now modified to meet the requirements of these different types. Group 1 will evidently form the listeners of the future. It is a large group, and shows little capacity for artistic performance, and emphasis is laid on training in listening. Active listening is a form of creative activity at second-hand; it is capable of great development by exercise and training. Familiarity with the masterpieces of musical literature is aimed at. (Here wireless and gramophone may prove helpful.) These are studied both artistically and then against their historical background. Practical work includes familiarisation with the construction and method of sound production in instruments of all kinds, co-ordinated with handwork in the earlier stages, the pupils making simple instruments and playing them. Singing, aural work, and rhythmic movement are continued.

Group 2 shows greater critical faculty than the previous group. The number of pupils belonging to it is therefore smaller. It will give us amateur and professional critics, and for this purpose some degree of executive ability is to be encouraged, since some technical knowledge of the subject is essential. Closer study is given to the actual material of music and the relation of music to the other arts. Care is taken to set this material in its correct historic perspective. The critical analysis of music is the chief study of this group.

Group 3 is the performers' class. In this group no pupil is allowed to learn an instrument before the age of nine. General musical training does not cease when instrumental work begins. Ensemble work is encouraged at an early stage of attainment, and the pupil's choice of instrument is arrived at by a process of trial and error on his part.

In Utopia the music teacher rarely teaches as we mortals understand it. He is an explorer who discovers new worlds with his pupils. He occupies a subordinate position in the expedition, since he has little or no control in deciding what field is to be explored. He is, however, endowed with one unique function—he is a scientist who must handle a most delicate mechanism, the human mind. In guiding his pupil's musical development his relation to the child makes him comparable to the wireless engineer. His task is to control the set. He can adjust wires, connect switches, join up coils; shut off dangerous currents; call up new stations or switch on new wave-lengths. His task is, in short, to assist the mechanism to function at its best.

The teacher's most interesting work will be done with the type of pupil whom we originally classified as Class 2—those urged to learn music by psychological reasons. Class 3 will need little or no assistance from the teacher except in matters of technique.

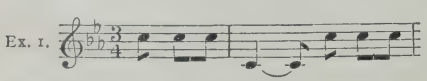
This ideal may sound fantastic and impracticable to the music teacher of to-day. Let us remember, however, that successful experiments are already in working order at schools such as Notting Hill High School, Streatham Hill High School, and the Mary Datchelor School. Here music is taught as a regular subject from the lowest to the highest forms. American and Continental schools are making other experiments. Mr. Dolmetsch at Bedales has emphasised the value of ensemble playing, and has dared to run counter to much standard teaching in order the more readily to achieve his purpose.

A scheme such as I have outlined is therefore not impossible of achievement. It will no doubt need modification to meet the differences of environment and material, and much work must be done before we can arrive at successful standards of measuring musical capacity. Above all, public opinion must be educated. An ideal is, however, an incentive to effort, and any contribution which we can make towards its realisation is infinitely worth while.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

Questions must be of general musical interest. They must be stated simply and briefly, and if several are sent, each must be written on a separate slip. Our 'Answers to Correspondents' column closes on the 14th of the month. We cannot undertake to reply by post.

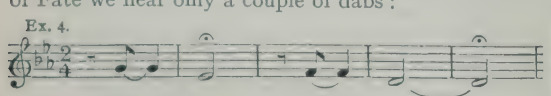
A. J. B.—You raise an interesting point that has often struck us when listening to the Presto of Beethoven's Harp Quartet. Like you, we have never yet heard the rhythm clearly shown. The last performance we heard was that broadcast recently, and, as usual, Beethoven's :



came out as :

In Cobbett's 'Encyclopedic Survey of Chamber Music,' just published, is a reference to this matter. Mr. Cobbett says, 'This movement provokes invariably the comment that it recalls the C minor Symphony, in which players find it notoriously difficult to avoid giving the impression of triplets in the opening bars, except by slightly stressing the second quaver of each group :

a proceeding not altogether orthodox.' Orthodox or not, we wish players would give the tiny stress at the beginning of the movement, so as to establish the rhythm; there would be no difficulty afterwards. Apropos of the fifth Symphony, it is not only the rhythm that is frequently lost; sometimes the definition disappears as well, and instead of the hammering blows of Fate we hear only a couple of dabs :



The above are only two of many such unsatisfactory details. Are they the result of too much pace, or too little thought?

A. C. T. (Fulham).—For your Bach lecture-recital you might well undertake the Cantata 'God's time is the best.' For separate chorales try the collection of 'Thirteen Chorales,' published by Novello. You say you have a 'cellist able to manage a few movements of the unaccompanied 'cello sonatas. Take our advice and let that 'cellist play something a little less forbidding to the ordinary hearer. Why not a good 'cello arrangement? (A vandalistic suggestion, perhaps, but we are not ashamed of it.) Bach's unaccompanied string solo works are for specialists, and for specialist hearers even more than specialist players. Don't begin your Bach propaganda work by boring people. Similarly let your pianist play a couple of groups of the livelier dance movements from the Suites; if the 'Forty-eight' be drawn on, see that the more tuneful and readily attractive numbers be chosen. As you have a two-manual organ at your disposal, you will of course include one or two organ solos. For books on Bach, for the benefit of the lecturer we suggest any of the following: 'Bach,' by Rutland Boughton (John Lane); Schweitzer's 'J. S. Bach,' translated by Ernest Newman, two volumes (Breitkopf & Härtel); Parry's 'Johann Sebastian Bach' (Putnam), and, of course, 'Spitta' (Novello).

T. J.—(1.) Apparently no articles on Raff and Moszkowski have appeared in the Musical Times—at all events in recent years. (2.) Mr. Francesco Berger's address is 38, Hardwicke Road, N.13. (3.) We cannot discover the titles of Moszkowski's Op. 3 and Op. 90, nor the opus number of his 'Phantasticher Zug' and the Scherzo for violin and pianoforte. (4.) We cannot spare space or time to give you a critical analysis of Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme of Beethoven for two pianofortes. It will be an interesting and profitable occupation for you and your fellow player to analyse it (and criticise it, too, if you can) as you study it. (5.) You ask why Raff's music is so little performed now. We imagine that like most of the lesser composers of his day, he is squeezed out, partly by fashion and partly because he is not big enough to hold his own with the giants, and too good to be able to compete with the composers of popular trifles. (He wrote at least two good trifles, though—the Cavatina and 'La Fileuse.' We agree that the latter is one of the most charming of pianoforte solos.

R. D. S.—We do not propose to add to your already extensive list of 'systems.' Instead, we would draw your attention to the oft-repeated advice of the really great teachers of the age: Find material for your development in music itself. Cull difficulties from the music you are actually working at. Don't search for problems in books of 'Technical studies' when better ones lie at your very door in almost every piece you play. On the other hand, the nature of your technique has to be considered. This must be founded upon free and natural movements. A simple illustration will suffice. Turn, freely and easily, the handle of a door. Do it several times. Then go to the keyboard and play a passage of broken octaves. Are your muscular movements similar? Are they effected with equal ease? If not, your technique can neither be free nor natural. Upon analogies of this kind the whole of modern technique of the best stamp is based. The principles themselves are simple, though the 'systems' often confuse them or actually transform them into complexities. E. F.

E. W.—You are suffering from the divine discontent which often afflicts those who 'look into the glory beyond.' That is all to the good. But it must not induce you to take the risk of so momentous a step as you propose, even with our stalwart advice as a support! No! The better way will be for you to submit yourself to the judgment of an experienced and sympathetic teacher. Write to such a one, asking him to suggest an all-round programme of work to be brought to him as a test after, say, three months' study. Then abide by the result. That will try your mettle in more ways than one; in patience and endurance, for instance. E. F.

Vocalist.—(1.) We know no setting of 'Revenge, Timotheus cries,' other than that of Handel. (2.) You ask us which of Wagner's operas contains the finest bass solo music. This is a poser! So much depends upon the particular bass who sings it. On the whole, we think 'The Mastersingers.' (3.) Books on voice-culture are so numerous that we really prefer to make no suggestion. Be guided by your teacher. (4.) You ask for a 'list of bass songs (classics, of course) for displaying the low notes of the voice.' You add, 'I hope you understand my meaning.' We do. It is that you have some good low notes and want to show them off! Try the following: Handel's 'Droop not, young lover,' in A minor, and 'Hear me, ye winds and waves,' in G minor, Gounod's Vulcan's Song, in A minor, Mendelssohn's 'I'm a roamer,' in C (this shows off the high ones as well, as, in fact, do almost all these bass songs), Schubert's 'Doppelgänger,' in G minor, and 'O ruddier than the cherry.' Then think more of middle notes than the abysmal ones.

Inquirer.—We gather that the path of the teacher is one in which you have no experience. That is a great drawback, especially as you propose to start with children—one of the hardest of tasks. It is true that children's methods exist, but if you are wise and enthusiastic you will cultivate one of your own. Remember that all depends upon the development of the three senses used in practical music. Your children must be taught to listen; therefore you will play often to them. They must be helped to read what they hear; therefore you will develop their visual sense and correlate it with the aural. Their progress in playing will depend upon the growth of their ear-power and eye-power. Keep this sequence always before you, and success will come. Ignore it, by giving pure keyboard work with no aural and visual preparation, and you will fail. E. F.

M. M. W.—You ask for a complete list of books written by Dr. Bairstow and Mr. Harvey Grace. The former has written 'Handel's Oratorio, "The Messiah"' (Oxford University Press, 1*s.* 6*d.*); the latter: 'The Organ Works of Bach' (Novello, 9*s.*), 'The Organ Works of Rheinberger' (Novello, 5*s.*), 'French Organ Music, Past and Present' (Gray, $1.50), 'The Complete Organist' (The Richards Press, 6*s.*), 'Beethoven' (Kegan Paul, 7*s.* 6*d.*), 'A Musician at Large' (Oxford University Press, 6*s.*), and 'A Handbook for Choralists' (Novello, 1*s.* 6*d.*). We cannot 'mark with an asterisk those that are the most instructive from a musician's point of view,' because all depends on what are the musician's chief interests. You ask also if there are any biographies of these writers. Not yet; but you will find brief particulars in 'Grove.'

R. L.—The reading of musical notation should be precisely like the reading of letters. When the symbols do not stand for sounds, reproduction is accompanied by very great difficulty. When the sounds indicated by the symbols are aurally and definitely recognised, reproduction becomes a relatively easy process. There is but one way of reaching the power which hears, reads, and plays a passage with equal ease, and that is through the study of harmony adapted to the three senses in question. This has recently been brought into special prominence by Ernest Fowles in his 'Ear, Eye, and Hand in Harmony-Study' (Oxford University Press).

C. A. B.—Here are some good clarinet solos (not arrangements): Gade—Fantasiestücke, Op. 43; C. H. Lloyd—Duo Concertante; Reger—Two Pieces, Op. 49; Reinecke—Fantasiestücke, Op. 22; and Op. 167 and Op. 256; Saint-Saëns—Op. 167; Schumann—Fantasiestücke, Op. 23; Tovey—Op. 16; Walthew—Suite; Weber—Grand Duo, Op. 47. All from Novello.

Cornwall.—Your formidable batch of questions is suspiciously like an examination paper, and is rather beyond the scope of this column. Unless our answers were copiously illustrated with music-type they would have no interest for the general reader, and we have to consider that point. Sorry!

A. C. G.—In conducting quick movements of the type you mention it is not necessary to beat in such a way as to show the grouping of the bars (three-bar rhythm, four-bar rhythm, and so on). If the pace be such that the bar is the unit, you simply beat the bars, though naturally you would see that the rhythmic scheme was grasped.

Descant.—It is hard for us to suggest music for your prospective choir, as we have no idea of the degree of difficulty required. Presumably you have; so we advise you to write to Novello's for a parcel of part-songs, &c., on approval. Mention one or two suitable pieces as a guide.

F. B.—For your study of the American organ try King Hall's 'Harmonium Primer' (Novello). For pieces and studies try the same composer's 'Original Studies and Arrangements.' There are also many collections of pieces for harmonium, and organ music for manuals only, published by Novello.

H. H. C.—Mr. Thalben Ball tells us that the setting of the Gloria Patri about which you inquire is peculiar to the Temple Church, and is unpublished.

K. I.—Schumann's 'Carnaval' and Andante and Variations are available in duet form (one pianoforte). They can be had from Novello.

Lay-Vicar.—We confess ourselves stumped by the term 'E lami,' which appears at the beginning of Creighton's Service in E flat. Can a reader explain?

A large number of readers have kindly sent information in reply to 'A.R.C.M.' Apparently the book our correspondent inquired about is either 'In Praise of Music,' by Sayle (Elliot Stock), or 'The Bond of Music,' edited by Duncan and August McDougall (Truslove & Hanson). Our impression is that the book we ourselves treasured and lost was the latter.

Occasional Notes

The twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Oriana Madrigal Society is an event that ought not to go unchronicled. Memories are short, and it is necessary to remind many musicians that the revival of the English madrigal school began a good many years ago. The June Musical Times contained an obituary of Lionel Benson, who was doing good work in this field nearly forty years ago with the Magpie Madrigal Society. And twenty-five years ago—which sounds even more imposing if we call it a quarter of a century—Mr. Kennedy Scott began the activities which he has carried on ever since with a mixture of enthusiasm, modesty, and good taste that is not likely to be over-praised. Since the inception of the Oriana choir much has happened. Practically the whole output of the Elizabethans has been made available for performing purposes; and madrigals are now sung (and sung well) in many quarters up and down the country where a decade ago the mere name and form were practically unknown. When the credit for this revival is shared—with specially warm acknowledgments to Dr. Fellowes and his research work, and to the English Singers for their object-lessons in performance—let us not forget the pioneering Magpies and the long spell of work by the Oriana conductor and singers. Mr. Scott and his choir have steadily built up a London public for madrigals, and have set a standard in a cappella singing of old and new music which is probably unexcelled in the country. We write this not unmindful of the brilliant achievements of such bodies as the Glasgow Orpheus and the leading competitive choirs in the North and Midlands. In an estimate of this kind, however, the question of répertoire is of prime importance. A choir that can maintain so consistently high a standard as that of the Oriana, year in year out, in a repertory that ranges from the early polyphonists, not only of the English but also of the Continental schools, down to the most exacting examples of present-day choral writing, may claim the right to look for its peers only among choirs that have covered the same ground. We suggest that an appropriate way of celebrating the twenty-fifth birthday of the choir would be a publication of a full list of works performed by the Society, with information as to publishers, &c. Such a booklet would be of interest and value to choral conductors and others, as well as a permanent record of a fine achievement.

It was a happy chance that within a few days of the twenty-fifth anniversary concert of the Oriana there took place a concert by the Philharmonic Choir which was agreed on all hands to have reached the high-water mark of the Choir's work. London daily paper critics have not as a rule been over-kind to Metropolitan choirs. (Often their notices might be boiled down to: 'The singing was good—for a London choir.') This Philharmonic Choir concert produced unadulterated eulogy. Here are a few stray blooms from these rare bouquets—the only ones on which we can lay our hands at the moment:

'First-class performances . . . . . one of the most brilliant performances of Holst's "Hymn of Jesus" that the work can ever have had . . . . . Mr. Kennedy Scott may be proud of his modern programme and of his splendid choir.'—The Times.

'Of the choir's complete familiarity with the complex texture of "The Hymn of Jesus" this performance left us in no doubt whatever. One has rarely experienced quite the same thrill from the acid harmonies and crashing climaxes as was achieved with so competent an air last night.'—Daily Telegraph.

'This concert was an experience to be grateful for . . . . so high a standard that Northern choirs will have to look to their laurels.'—Observer.

'. . . . a performance of Holst's "Hymn of Jesus" that brought out the peculiar mystical rapture better than any I had hitherto heard.'—Sunday Times.

The reference to Northern choirs seems to be inevitable! But with all our admiration for the tonal splendour of these choirs, we regard any kind of comparison as out of the question until our friends in the North tackle the same kind of programme. At present we doubt if there exists anywhere a choir that can equal the record of the Philharmonic in the number of new, unfamiliar, and difficult works it has successfully performed during the nine years of its life.

All this leads up to a final and interesting fact, namely, that the founder and conductor of these two unique choirs has given his services for twenty-three of the Oriana's twenty-five years, and during the whole of the Philharmonic Choir's existence. Such a sacrifice would be notable if he were a leisured amateur. But he is not. He is a busy professional musician, so we leave readers to find a sufficiently laudatory adjective. We can't. At the Oriana concert mentioned above, Mr. Scott was presented with a laurel wreath, which he bestowed at once on his senior bass, a gentleman who has sung with him longer than any other member of his choir. A laurel wreath is a picturesque form of tribute, but it has two disadvantages. Its presentation is witnessed by few, and it soon withers. We prefer the circulating and enduring printed word. That is why we have written the above.

Mr. Arnold Bennett's Wednesday article in the Evening Standard is one of our weekly pleasures. We like Mr. Bennett especially because, almost alone among literary men, he finds music worth mentioning, and (more wonderful still) can talk about it in a sensible manner. Here is a typical little paragraph. Discussing the technique of writing, he adds :

> 'The fact is that people who have no natural feeling for literature can only meddle with literature on pain of being silly. I remember once sitting down to struggle with Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata, Op. 3. A great pianist happened to enter the room. He said to me laconically, "If I were you I shouldn't meddle with that." I didn't meddle with it.'

Mr. Bennett is a familiar figure in many rôles—yachtsman, painter, dramatist, novelist, publicist, journalist, &c. It is pleasant to see the brilliant all-rounder as a struggling pianist, having a quiet wrestle with Beethoven's most difficult sonata, being put in his place by an expert, and modestly admitting the fact. By the bye, mention of Mr. Bennett in connection with music reminds us of the very interesting structure adopted by him in a recent article. By chance or design—we think the latter—the form was that of a Rondo. We regret that we did not keep the copy, so cannot quote the passage that was analogous to the principal theme of a rondo. But it made its appearance at least three times, as a properly-conducted rondo subject must do. For obvious reasons the recurring subject had to be short and the episodes long. But the reading of it gave us so much pleasure that we wondered if there are not unexplored possibilities in this way. It is true that many writers have used musical labels for their essays, but the likeness has usually stopped with the label. (For example, de Quincey's 'Dream Fugue' is a rhapsody rather than a fugue.) The result can most easily be obtained in verse form, where, for example, the connection between the musical rondo and the rondel is obvious. Not long since we had (but lent and lost) a book of poetry in which was made an attempt to imitate various musical forms. But there is, of course, a fatal bar to such an imitation. Language can work only in one dimension, and so it can represent only melody—and that but roughly. This book of poetry tried to produce something analogous to musical polyphony, several lines being printed in different colours and read (by those who could manage the feat) simultaneously.

The analogy broke down, because the combined lines of type produced mental confusion in the reader, whereas combined strands of melody produce harmony.

Coming back to Mr. Bennett and music, his review of Romain Rolland's 'Beethoven the Creator' strikes us as being a model of the brief, pithy type. We venture to quote a little from it—although to quote a little is to quote almost the whole :

> 'First . . . this book is largely on Romain Rolland. Too much of "a portrait in a mirror." . . . Second, it suffers from an excess of eloquence. . . . Romain Rolland might advantageously have followed Verlaine's poetic advice : "Take eloquence and wring its neck." I consider that Ernest Newman should have taken and wrung its neck on behalf of the author. . . . Nevertheless, "Beethoven the Creator" is a book full of illumination and lofty emotion, and extremely readable. Physically it is too thick and heavy for comfort—perhaps because of the plates, which are very interesting. And the stitchery of the binding has not yet won my confidence.'

It has lost ours. Already, after a moderate amount of handling, there are signs of approaching disintegration.

In the June Musical Times mention was made of the Newcastle Bach Choir's performance of Tallis's Forty-part Motet. The current number of the Dominant contains an interesting account by Dr. Whittaker of the preparation for this performance. As there may be a few Musical Times readers who don't see the Dominant we pass on some of the material. The article leads off with a paragraph which we dwell on because it has some bearing on our remarks above. The Newcastle Bach Choir, like the Oriana, has a unique record, though of a different sort. It has more performances of Bach's cantatas to its credit than any other English choir, and has probably sung more out-of-the-way works than any other body of singers. Dr. Whittaker says that in order to acquire a wide basis of technique and a mental stimulus, the Choir each year embarks upon some adventure. 'These annual hazards have ranged from the first complete performance of Byrd's Great Service, in 1924, to Warlock's "The Full Heart," the minute-and-a-quarter performance of which necessitated some thirty-six rehearsals.' That is the right (and unusual) combination of qualities—adventure and sticking power!

Dr. Whittaker says that the appearance of the Tallis volume in the Carnegie series last year made him long to tackle the Motet. As a boy he had cast covetous eyes at Dr. Mann's 1888 edition, wondering whether he would ever have the opportunity of unravelling the work. The new Carnegie edition proved to be 'as seductive as a map of Treasure Island,' and he decided to tackle the Motet with his Newcastle Choir. There were many obstacles, and the first one might easily have been insuperable. The copies cost thirty shillings apiece, besides being so large and so heavy that Dr. Whittaker had doubts about the ability of singers (even these stout Tynesiders) to hold the volume up during a long rehearsal. (We point out that the copy is stoutly bound, stands just over 2-ft. high, and a little over a foot and a half across!) However, the difficulty was solved by one of the members undertaking to write out two copies of each voice-part—permission having been duly obtained from the publishers, of course. This devoted copyist—with a sister to assist him—not only wrote out the due eleven thousand bars; he also devised an excellent system of cues, 'so that every chorister could trace some easily heard line (given in red ink) throughout every rest, thus making each new start as plain as any singer could desire, and lessening enormously the intricacies of rehearsal. In addition, this noble pair of enthusiasts bound every copy in strong covers.' (Let the names of the noble pair be duly published—Mr. W. R. James and Miss James.)

Much still had to be done before rehearsals could be undertaken. If ever a score needed preliminary study on the part of a conductor it was this one. Dr. Whittaker soon saw that the chief danger would be that of 'meaningless stodging through the vocal lines, an inevitable temptation when so many bewildering and conflicting sounds would be heard by the singer on all sides, and when in the nature of things no member of the choir could realise the effect as a whole.' Another detail that had to be considered was the very frequent high G's for the soprano voices, which would lead to a monotonous prominence of that note unless preventive steps were taken. A careful dynamic scheme had therefore to be worked out, with a leaning towards the soft side, and a marking of every phrase in accordance with the generally-accepted principles of the performance of vocal polyphony. The score thus contained some hundreds of expression marks. As the Motet is laid out for eight five-part choirs (S.A.T.B.B.), and the Newcastle Bach Choir numbers only forty-eight singers, additions had to be made. Obviously, at least two voices were necessary for each line of the Motet, so four sopranos, four contraltos, four tenors, and twenty basses were added to the Choir for the occasion.

> 'The disposition of these eighty voices, the weighing up of light against heavy voices, the choice of high and low compass to suit individual choristers, the allocation of the more reliable singers to the more troublesome lines, the coupling of someone experienced in Tudor music with someone new to it, meeting the wishes of friends who desired to be together, and the provision of eleventh-hour substitutes for those compelled by illness to drop out, was a task compared with which the organization of a general election political campaign would be child's play.'

Each choir was arranged with four women in front and six men behind. Of the eight choirs Nos. 6, 7, and 8 were in front from left to right, 3, 4, and 5 immediately behind, and 1 and 2 at the back. This suited the structure of the work, and was also a convenient arrangement for the conductor, being easy to remember.

As we mentioned in our report last month, the work had three performances at this concert. In our review of the Carnegie edition some months ago, we alluded to the fact that many musicians were disposed to regard the work merely as a learned curiosity. From a study of the score we dissented from that view, and expressed our conviction that it was a masterpiece. We are therefore interested in the conclusion of Dr. Whittaker's Dominant article, wherein he discusses the æsthetic side of the Motet. He says that he has frequently been asked whether it is merely a freak of ingenuity and whether there is any real musical interest in it. He says that few works have moved him so powerfully in rehearsal and performance. He goes on:

> 'The serious beauty of the themes, the range of emotions, the variety of the music, tender, massive, exhilarating by turns, the rich colouring owing to the large proportion of male voices, the numerous changes of shade and power obtained by the treatment of various groupings, and the consummate ease with which the composer leads his multitudes through their pilgrimage, make the Motet of living interest from start to finish. The portion where all voices move independently suggests the throbbing cries of many nations prostrate before their Maker, and is a curious anticipation by nearly three hundred years of one part of the extravagant dream of Berlioz related in the final chapter of his work on orchestration. Other sections attain a remote serenity which few passages in music can equal. Whether viewed as an architectural scheme, a contrapuntal feat, an experiment in colour, an expression of emotion, or as an essay in musical thought, Spem in alium is undoubtedly a work of genius.'

For the information of conductors who, fired by the Newcastle exploit, and bursting to be up and at the Motet, we add that it takes nine and a half minutes to perform.

The Committee of the Mendelssohn Scholarships Foundation announces that a scholarship of the value of £200 a year, for which there were twenty-four competitors, has been awarded to Mr. David Moule Evans. Miss Imogen Holst and Miss Elizabeth Maconchy were adjudged to be next in order of merit.

Mr. Evans, who is twenty-four years of age, and a Mus. Bac., Oxon., received his musical education at the Royal College of Music, where he studied composition under Mr. Herbert Howells. Several of his works have been performed at Patrons' Fund Concerts at the College, and his Concerto for String Orchestra was published by the Carnegie Trust last year.

The outcry against the vocal wobble has already produced results, if we may judge from the inclusion in a competition syllabus of a class for 'Fixed Voice Choirs.' On the other hand, the announcement may be merely a sly dig on the part of the printer. Anyway, the idea is worth following up, and we hope that Savoy Hill will start a vigorous recruiting campaign for Fixed-voice Sopranos.

Church and Organ Music

ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS

ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING

The annual general meeting will be held on Saturday, July 20, at 2.15 p.m. Members only.

DISTRIBUTION OF DIPLOMAS

Members and friends are cordially invited to the distribution of diplomas by the President, Dr. E. C. Bairstow, at 3 p.m., on Saturday, July 20. The President will deliver an address on 'Music in Relationship to Life,' and Mr. G. D. Cunningham, organist of Birmingham Town Hall, will play upon the College organ the following pieces selected for the January examination, 1930:

FELLOWSHIP

Introduction and Passacaglia in D minor Alan Gray

Allegro con grazia (5-4), from 'Symphony Pathétique,' No. 5 ... ... Tchaikovsky
(Arranged for the organ by Charles Macpherson.)

Fantasia, 'Valet will ich dir geben,' in B major ... ... J. S. Bach
(Novello, Book 19, p. 2; Peters, Book 7, No. 50; Augener, p. 863.)

ASSOCIATESHIP

Air (No. 2 of Three Short Pieces) (Novello) ... ... Samuel Wesley

Choral Improvisation, 'O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort' ... ... Karg-Elert

After the organ recital there will be an informal conversazione to which members and friends are invited. Tea and coffee. No tickets required, but, as accommodation is limited, admission is not guaranteed.

The doors will be open for the distribution at 2.45 p.m. H. A. HARDING, Hon. Secretary.

ORGAN PEDAL TECHNIQUE

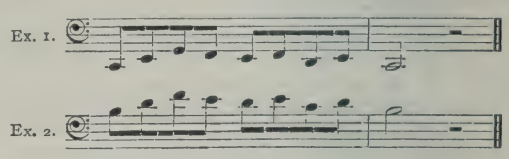
By J. E. BARKWORTH

[The following article appeared in the Musical Times of November, 1918. It is reprinted, by way of supplement to the recent debate on the subject in our columns.—EDITOR.]

There has recently been some discussion in the Musical Times on Organ Pedal Technique. Now the remarkable fact about pedal technique is that its principles have never been deeply considered nor systematically worked out like those of pianoforte touch or violin fingering. One of our foremost teachers confessed to me that he had acquired his pedalling haphazard in boyhood, and had no system to teach; and he spoke the simple truth. The various instruction books give pedal exercises and scales, with the footing marked empirically and on no system. Even the design of the pedals is not uniform; about twenty years ago the Royal College of Organists adopted a new standard pedal-board, and the American Guild of Organists another. Apparently these two bodies neither consulted each other nor any eminent organists of France or Germany. The American and British pedal-boards are superficially alike, but there are many small points of difference, all, to my mind, in favour of the American pattern. And the bench, which is as important as the keys, has never been considered in the light of the real nature of the physical action involved. Yet modern organ actions admit of a great development in pedal playing. In many organs the touch is so light that a glissando is easy; and there is no reason why pedal-playing should be cumbrous, uncertain, or fatiguing.

When I was teaching in Baltimore, I worked out the elements of a system by which my pupils quickly acquired rapid and certain execution; it was founded on a book by Nielsen, the Swedish organist,* who in turn derived his ideas from Lemmens. It remained incomplete, because I ceased to teach; but a brief account of it may be of interest.

While it is wrong to slide along the bench to reach the extreme keys, yet these cannot be reached without turning the body on a vertical axis. To prove this, play the following passages:



During the minim rest you have to turn the body on a vertical axis. But since neither feet nor hands are touching anything, you will find that you can only make this turn by an awkward jerky wriggle. If the bottom C were a semibreve, and there were no rest, you would turn the body by pushing from the left foot resting on the C key; or if there were still a rest, but your hands were on manual keys, you would turn the body by pushing from them, though you might be unaware of it. This turning of the body corresponds to the shift in violin-playing; and some means must be found for judging the amount of the turn with surety. But with an ordinary bench this amount depends on the extent of the friction between the surface of the bench and the clothes of the player; and this friction is variable, and causes physical irritation and discomfort.

It is better to be seated on a revolving music-stool; this saves irritation and fatigue, and makes it possible to gauge with certainty the amount of revolution of the body.

Next, it is not necessary on a modern pedal-board, with smooth-surfaced keys and light touch, to wear boots or shoes; it is better to play in stocking-feet. At first you will be afraid of stubbing your toes, but this will not happen; and in a week it will seem as clumsy to wear boots on your feet as to wear hedging-gloves on your hands. The absence of boot-heels makes it necessary to set the stool an inch lower—that is all.

The shape of the keys is another point in the material equipment. Among recent attempts at improvement, a few organs have discs projecting outwards from the bottom C sharp and the top E flat keys, on which the toe (as it is called, really the ball underneath the root of the great toe) falls more easily. A few have a raised step on the forward end of the two A flat keys, to obviate the difficulty caused by the three short keys in succession; and Nielsen suggests that all the short keys might be made long enough to use the heel on them. But these points of design are not likely to be generally adopted, and we will deal with the ordinary concave and radiating pedal-board.

* An English translation is published by Messrs. Schirmer.

(July, 1929)

Now the distinguishing notes of modern pedalling are the greatly extended use of the heel, and, partly as a consequence, the less frequent crossing of the feet, which in rapid passages is to be avoided as much as possible, and should not occur oftener than the crossing of one finger over another. Toeing and heeling a number of notes with one foot used to be condemned as leading to involuntary phrasing, and deprecated as a bad trick acquired by the player who wished to keep the other foot always on the swell pedal. Neither objection will stand. After a few days of elementary practice with the toes, the pupil should learn to play a true legato with toe and heel, practising the following exercise :

Left foot.

and some exercises in thirds, of which I will give only one specimen :

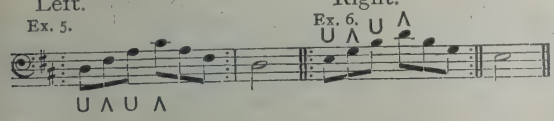
Ex. 5. Ex. 6.



the point of which will appear later.

Next consider this. The two toes and two heels together resemble a hand with four fingers, except that, unlike the four fingers, they can succeed each other in any order, and should learn to do so. Take the scale of E major and make groups of four notes. We shall find nearly every variety of succession of the two toes and two heels :

Same as the first.

Leave F and A till the last. They involve the use of two toes followed by two heels (or two heels by two toes)—a difficult succession, but most useful. Work out a similar exercise in the key of A flat.

When these can be played quickly with ease, proceed to scales. Rapid scales on the pedals seldom extend beyond an octave, and should be so practised.

Take Exx. Nos. 5 and 6, and interlace them. You get the scale of D :

Ex. 8.

Each foot uses toe and heel alternately, and there is no crossing of feet. Practice will soon enable you to play this scale presto.

The scales of C, G, and F have the same model as D.

The scale of E is similar. So are those of E flat and B flat, except that in these scales the toe begins in the left foot, and the heel in the right.

A flat is unique. Model :

The scales of B, F sharp, and D flat are peculiar, owing to the three short keys coming in succession :

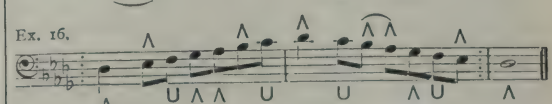
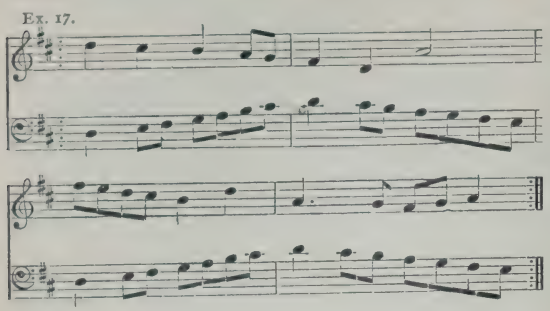
Ex. 16.



I will not now take up space by working out the minor scales ; perhaps a later opportunity will be found for dealing with them, and also with the shift mentioned above, the use of which is best explained in connection with broken chords.

The pupil should, after practising each exercise with feet alone, add a counterpoint for the left hand, thus :

Ex. 17.



This assumes some intelligence in the pupil; but it is wise to do so.

At Bangor Cathedral, on June 2, the choir gave a fine recital of English Church music, the programme including Byrd's Magnificat (Gregorian tones), Gibbons's 'Hosanna to the Son of David,' Purcell's 'Thy Word is a Lantern,' Battishill's 'Call to Remembrance,' Wesley's 'Wilderness,' Parry's 'There is an old belief,' Bairstow's 'Save us, O Lord,' &c. Mr. Leslie Paul conducted. The organ at this Cathedral has recently been re-built by Messrs. Hill, and is now a fine instrument of four manuals, with sixty-four speaking stops and twenty-one couplers. Recitals following the opening have been given by Mr. Paul (Handel's Concerto in G minor, Hollins's Concert Overture, Slater's 'An Easter Alleluya,' and Harwood's 'Pæan'; and Dr. H. C. L. Stocks (Bach's Toccata and Fugue in C, Guilmant's March on a Theme of Handel, Sullivan's 'In Memoriam' Overture, &c.).

Ernest Austin's tone-poem 'The Pilgrim's Progress' has been played in its entirety (twelve parts) on recent Sundays by Mr. Oliver H. Edwards at Prince's Road Welsh Presbyterian Church, Liverpool. For the performance of the last two parts Mr. Edwards had the assistance of harp (Miss Alwena Roberts), violin (Mr. Edgar Evans), tubular bells (Mr. Hywel Jones), and voices. Annotated leaflets supplied by the publisher have enabled the congregation to follow the work with interest and understanding.

The organ at Springfield Hall Wesleyan Mission, Wandsworth Road, has been rebuilt by Messrs. Henry Willis. The opening took place on June 10, Mr. Allan Brown giving a recital (Schumann's Canon in B minor, Lemare's Fantasia on 'Hanover,' Bach's Great G minor, Franck's Pastorale, Wolstenholme's Finale in B flat, &c.).

At Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, on June 2, the 'XXV.' Orchestra played a Mozart Symphony and, with Mr. W. J. Emery, played Handel's Organ Concerto in B flat. The choir sang Wesley's 'Wilderness' and Bairstow's 'Blessed be Thou, O Lord God of Israel.' Mr. J. Chalmers Park conducted.

Mr. Vernon Butcher gave an organ recital for children at St. Andrew's Church, Oxford, on May 17, playing thirteen pieces, all by English composers, from the Elizabethan period to the present day.

Mr. Herbert Westerby has broadcast over two hundred modern English organ pieces from the new Grosvenor Hall, Belfast, on Fridays during the past year.

Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper have installed a new organ in Stowe School Chapel—a three-manual of forty-three speaking stops and thirty adjustable pistons.

Letters to the Editor

A BEETHOVEN READING

SIR,—On p. 431 of the Musical Times for May there is a curious 'mix-up' in the Answer to Correspondent 'R. G. R.' Quoting from the second section of the second subject (first movement of Beethoven's Op. 10, No. 3), it reads thus :

'In Beethoven's Sonata in D, Op. 10, No. 3, the phrase :

Ex. 1.

should be played :

Ex. 2.

Beethoven was in the habit of writing appoggiaturas without crossing the quaver.'

So do we all. Beethoven wrote acciaccaturas first, according to Nottebohm, but apparently changed his mind later and 'corrected in the long appoggiatura wherever this motive appears'! I quote from Reinecke's 'Letters on the Beethoven Sonatas.' He writes it thus in his edition (Breitkopf) :

Ex. 3.

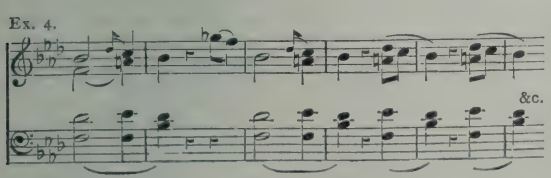
and so do d'Albert and Corder, while Lebert, Lamond, Casella, and Macpherson make the grace note an acciaccatura.—Yours, &c.,

NANCY GILFORD.

40, Argyle Square, W.C.1.

[The apparent 'mix-up' is due to our having omitted the word 'short' before 'appoggiaturas.' Miss Gilford's quotation from Nottebohm as to the 'long appoggiatura' shows that the 'long' and 'short' may be used to distinguish between the acciaccatura and the appoggiatura proper. Until we looked up the point in Casella we had always followed the reading Miss Gilford gives of this D major Sonata example. (It sounds better, for one thing.) But Casella puts the case so logically that we felt he was right. Here is his ruling : 'In the music of Beethoven's time it is not always easy to see whether an appoggiatura is long or short. But so far as Beethoven himself is concerned the question has been from henceforth exhausted. [This we take to be translator's English for 'the question is now settled.' Per quanta riguarda Beethoven, la questione è armai esaurientemente risolta.] We know that, as a matter of fact, from his earliest youth he wrote all long appoggiaturas in actual notes. To prove this it is sufficient to quote the famous example taken from Sonata Op. 2, No. 1 :

Ex. 4.



If Beethoven had wished the 𝅘𝅥𝅯 to be long (i.e., to have the value of a quaver) he would not have written :

Ex. 5.

the second and third time. The confusion existing in times past arose from the fact that Beethoven's short appoggiaturas (acciaccature) almost never have the stroke through the tail. But numerous cases like the following :

Ex. 6.

or :

Ex. 7.

are so many proofs in support of the above assertion.'

Throughout, therefore, Casella regards such examples as the one quoted in Miss Gilford's letter as short appoggiaturas, and writes them 𝅘𝅥𝅯 accordingly. Logically, we think he is right—but musically? It looks very much as if players must use the form they prefer. In any case, we imagine that no examiner would penalise a candidate on so disputable a detail. —EDITOR.]

'OUR BERLIOZ EXCLUSIVES'

SIR,—I am reluctant to prolong a controversy of which most of your readers have by this time probably had more than enough, but in his notes last month your exuberant contributor, 'Feste,' has seen fit to make statements with reference to my attitude towards Berlioz that I can hardly allow to pass without comment and correction. He quotes a sentence from my 'History of Music,' in which I say that the admirers of Berlioz are in a sense a race apart, that one is either for him or against him, and then proceeds to draw implications from this simple statement which are entirely gratuitous and erroneous. He seems, for example, to imagine that I and those who think like me 'swallow Berlioz whole,' as he puts it, and 'maintain that the king can do no wrong.' What reason has he for supposing anything of the sort? This is the last attitude I should ever dream of maintaining towards any composer whatsoever.

No artist who has ever lived is without faults and weak passages, and I am quite cheerfully prepared to admit that Berlioz can show as many of them as, and possibly even more of them than, other great composers. Consequently, 'Feste's' lengthy citations of alleged crudities—leaving aside for the moment the question as to whether his particular examples are so or no—are entirely beside the point. Nothing would be easier than to compile an anthology of platitudes from the works of Beethoven, Schubert, Mozart—almost any composer in fact; but 'Feste' would, I hope and believe, be the first to admit that they would prove nothing whatsoever except the well-known fact that even Homer sometimes nodded. It is fairly safe to say that nine-tenths of Wordsworth and nineteen-twentieths of the poetry of Coleridge are virtually unreadable to-day, but they remain great poets none the less; and even if 'Feste' were able to convince me that no larger proportion of the music of Berlioz was of lasting interest and value, my estimate of his intrinsic artistic significance would in all probability remain fundamentally unchanged.

The point at issue in fact is not whether Berlioz did or did not sometimes write inferior music, but whether, taken all in all, he is a figure of primary significance. If you receive from his music, generally speaking, as I do, the impression of a major personality, and as profound and authentic an æsthetic emotion as that which you receive from that of the greatest masters, then you accept his faults and failings, for without them he would also be without his unique and irreplaceable qualities. They are all part and parcel of the man and his art, and inextricably interwoven with each other; you cannot separate them.

If, on the other hand, you do not receive this impression of fundamental greatness in all he does, even in his inferior work, you will no doubt regard Berlioz as 'Feste' would seem to do, as a second-rate artist (if that) with interesting moments, which is an entirely different thing from a great master with occasional or even with frequent lapses, which is how he appears to me to be. That is the issue in a nutshell, and from this point of view I think I am justified in claiming that one is either for Berlioz or against him. In a word, you either accept him as a great artist or you do not; nothing else matters very much.

In conclusion, while profoundly convinced of the uselessness of doing so, I willingly accept the courteous invitation extended by 'Feste' and yourself to contribute to your pages some time in the near future an article on Berlioz considered as a melodist.—Yours, &c.,

CECIL GRAY.

Campden Hill, W.8.

['Feste' writes:—'I am glad to find that Mr. Gray didn't mean what he plainly said. I have re-read the passages I quoted from his "History of Music," and I fail to see that I misrepresented him. I won't argue, having argued enough already. Instead, I refer readers to the passages quoted in my June article. It is good to hear that Mr. Gray accepts the invitation to write on the melodic side of Berlioz. But why does he say such an article will be useless? Does he suppose that the so-called anti-Berliozians are not open to conviction? Or is he nervous as to the supply of evidence concerning Berlioz's genius as a melodist?']

SIR,—Your 'Feste' article threw me back on the youthful days when August Jaeger, to whom I was 'first English friend,' took me to join the Richter Choir, which was then rehearsing Berlioz's 'Faust' at Store Street under that vociferous disciplinarian Herr Frautzen Jaeger. I loved those rehearsals, and as we then daily worked together, we were constantly whistling and singing the melodies! Those which have been with me through the years are 'The Sylphs,' the 'Flea Song,' the rollicking Serenade, the Students' Chorus ('Jam nox stellata,' &c.), and others in snatches to which I cannot give a name. They are, of course, mainly chorus melodies—we did not become intimately familiar with the arias, except as cues.

I think you go a little far in saying that the Rakoczy March is the only melody 'most of us can whistle.' The fact is that the March is heard apart from Berlioz, who himself has had no publicity. If he had enjoyed as much hackneying as Wagner ('Walkürenritt' and 'Meistersinger' Overture, e.g.), Berlioz might have proved himself captivating to the plain man. What always struck me in his melodies was their unconventionality and ingenuousness—so different from the toe-the-line character of those of Schubert, in which I was then soaked (and am not dry yet!).—Yours, &c.,

Walden, Cheam, Surrey. F. C. TILNEY.

SIR,—I have been greatly interested in the writings concerning Berlioz's compositions. This month I am delighted with 'Feste' when he says the March in 'Faust' is not by Berlioz. I have long wanted someone to agree with me on this subject. I was at the first performance at the Albert Hall, and was startled by knowing the March since I was a boy. I have an ancient copy, with portrait on cover, which says: 'Ràcoczy's Hungarian March, as performed at the London Wednesday Concerts, arranged by Jules Guggenheim, London, published by John Griggs, Southampton Row, Russell Square, and to be had of J. Campbell, 53, New Bond Street.'

I have long wanted to know how Berlioz came to place this march in his 'Faust'; his name is not mentioned on my copy. I have been trying for a long time in vain, but find this march dates back to 1790.—Yours, &c.,

Exmouth. FRANÇOIS EMILE CHOVEAUX.

A GOOD WORD FOR HENRY SMART

SIR,—I read with great pleasure in the April number of the Musical Times your commendation of Smart's organ music, and with equal pleasure some time back, in your very interesting interview with Dr. Alfred Hollins, his views concerning this composer.

I am afraid Smart is very little played nowadays, at any rate by leading English organists, and he may himself have been contributory owing to the fact that, with few exceptions, his works are from the present point of view of only moderate difficulty.

I recollect that about the beginning of last century an organist, then eminent, but now of outstanding eminence, remarked to me that he could not put Smart into his recital programmes for this very reason. At this time Lemare was holding sway at St. Margaret's, and my friend said, 'You know Lemare makes it awfully difficult for us fellows, as we are obliged to follow him.' I myself was brought up on Smart. I remember hearing W. T. Best (at the old Bow and Bromley Institute) play the early 'Con Moto' in B flat. This recital was, in more senses than one, epoch-making to me, as it gave me my first interest in the organ, which from that day has continued. Best very frequently included Smart's works in his programmes, and in fact Smart was almost the only English composer besides himself whose works Best played.

I wish the present generation of organists could interest themselves again in the works of this great organ composer. He died in July, 1879—fifty years ago. Little was done in 1913 to recognise the centenary of Smart's birth, and few of us now alive will be here to see the centenary of his death. I should like to think that organists throughout the country would call to memory Henry Smart by playing his works as their voluntaries. Thus, although we cannot celebrate the hundredth anniversary of his death, the fiftieth anniversary could receive some recognition.—Yours, &c.,

COPYRIGHT IN PROGRAMME NOTES

SIR,—The compilers and editors of concert programmes are apparently frequently ignorant of the fact that annotations used in such programmes are subject to the law of copyright equally with other literary and artistic property. Literary work is not thrown into the public domain merely because it is unsigned, and annotations cannot be borrowed wholly or in part without their author's copyright being infringed unless his authority has previously been obtained.

The former author of the annotations published in the Radio Times recently found that his work was being reproduced without acknowledgment and without his consent in the programmes issued on behalf of the managing body of the concert-room of a famous watering place, and it was discovered that the piracy had been systematically going on for many months. The only defence put forward by the person responsible for the infringements was that he was unaware that copyright subsisted in such work, and a plea 'in misericordiam' was accepted by the Society of Authors on the instructions of the author concerned, who had no desire in the circumstances to exact punitive damages.

Offenders will not in future, however, be dealt with so leniently, and it is to be hoped that in their own interest the compilers of programmes will confine their annotations to the fruit of their own brains or obtain the proper authority before availing themselves of the fruit of the brains of other persons.—Yours, &c.,

11, Gower Street, W.C.1. G. HERBERT THRING (Secretary, Society of Authors, Playwrights, and Composers).

A GOOD WORD FOR MECHANISED MUSIC

SIR,—In your June number Mr. Rutland Boughton makes the extraordinary statement that 'no one wants to see the same cinema play several times . . . or to hear the same gramophone record over again even though the source of the work be Bach or Beethoven.' If Mr. G. K. Chesterton had uttered this, one would have looked for the hidden paradox, but apparently the writer means to be taken seriously.

As regards the cinema film, it has to be remembered that this is not an age-old institution like the legitimate drama, but is in its infancy, and it is its infant crudities which prevent it being enjoyed over and over again. Nevertheless, a cinema proprietor told me he had seen

Charles Chaplin in the 'Circus' five times running and enjoyed it more each time, fresh subtleties of that consummate genius which had been previously missed being observed. Again, a master-work like 'Metropolis' needs to be seen several times before the beauties of the huge canvas of production are appreciated.

How much more so is this with the great works of music, and how can anybody possibly appreciate them the first time? During the last twelve months I have run through on my own gramophone: Brahms's Quintet in F minor, thirty-five times; Schubert's Trio in B flat, Op. 99, twenty-five times; Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony, twenty times—and so on. Could I by any other medium become really familiar with these great works, and add to the pleasure of listening that of analysis? How much would the average listener make of one performance of the Brahms Quintet, beyond a vague feeling that there were 'a lot of very pleasant melodies all mixed up'? How could he hear the Schubert Trio without a passionate desire to hear it again and again?

I am getting tired of the constant girding at 'our mechanised age.' It is a very pleasant age, and the machines are going to make it a great deal pleasanter. Of course, commerce must be served first. Before one can think of art at all, one must go out and hustle for food. But man does not and cannot live by bread alone, and once he has used his machines to grind his daily bread, he will use them secondarily to grace his life with the arts. And it is no more good for gentlemen like Mr. Boughton to try to stop the progress of the machines in art, than it was any good for the weavers of Bolton to break the machines in the 18th century.

To reduce the argument to absurdity, why have an organ when one could so easily go back to Pan's pipes? Even if one retires to cymbals and shawms one is still the creature of the machine.

Let us make the most and the best of our 'civilization-made machines' and not talk so much about our 'machine-made civilization.'—Yours, &c.,

'Mossgiel,' BRIAN EVEREST.

PROF. SANFORD TERRY AND NOVELLO EDITIONS OF BACH

SIR,—I cannot refrain from writing to express my gratification at your comments on the omission from Dr. Sanford Terry's latest book on Bach of any reference to the Novello edition of Bach's organ works.

When I read this book during the last Christmas holidays, I noticed this omission with pain and surprise. The omission is the more inexplicable to me as, in his valuable Appendix to his edition of Forkel, Dr. Terry did refer to this edition, which, after all said and done, was the first, and remains to date the only actual English edition of these works, properly so called, and therefore I should have thought that in an English book, written apparently for English readers, Dr. Terry would have repeated his Forkel procedure of adding Novello's to the editions to which he refers.

There is a further gap in Prof. Sanford Terry's 'Life of Bach' which you have not mentioned, and that is that, although in his Bibliography he does actually include the English translation of Spitta (well do I remember the joy with which I obtained these three volumes in July, 1899), all, or nearly all, of his references to Spitta in the text are to the German edition, which I should say very few people—except certain exceptional erudite musicians—possess in this country. In this same work there are a good many quotations in the original German, which, for ordinary English readers, should I think have been translated, and all these facts drive me to the conclusion (in which of course, I may be wrong) that Dr. Terry prepared his English book with a special view to the projected German edition—which by this time has, I think, become an accomplished fact. If this is so, the reason for the omission of any reference to the English edition of organ works, and the English translation, of Spitta, and all the German quotations, is fully explained. The book, as written, would have made the German translation a much more easy and convenient proceeding.—Yours, &c.,

SOPRANOS ARE RARE

SIR,—In the weekly and daily papers of late there have appeared certain criticisms on certain items in the performances provided by the British Broadcasting Corporation. In my humble opinion a good deal of this criticism is a little hard on a body that has so great a public responsibility, and so very difficult a position. It may be exceedingly difficult to obtain the fare that is demanded in many of the departments. I beg leave to illustrate by mention of one special point. As a singing master, I speak from my own point of view about one of the complaints that have been repeatedly made to me of late. Some time back one of your contributors quite justly complained of a serious deterioration in first-class singing, generally speaking. The complaints have been almost entirely applied to the soprano element. Now in my opinion this is hardly the fault of the B.B.C. They must be at their wits' end to remedy a defect which certainly does exist. The secret of the matter is the appalling scarcity of true soprano voices. Nine out of ten who appear on the programme as sopranos are not even mezzo-sopranos—they are high contraltos. This is a fact, though it does not appear to be generally known, and may indeed come as a surprise to a number of your readers.

The public has, nowadays, a unique opportunity of hearing multitudes of professional singers, and many a listener is an extremely good natural critic of voice production as well as artistic rendition. But those who cater for the public can only do the best they can with unsatisfactory material as far as the providing of soprano vocalists is concerned. All I can state is that the real or pure soprano voice is by far the rarest voice among women, and substitutes for it are found in lower voices that are specially trained to sing higher than their natural register. I am quite ready to prove this statement if it should be a matter of interest to your readers. The position of the substitute soprano is a tragic one.—Yours, &c.,

'ORGAN PEDALLING: PAST AND PRESENT'

SIR,—With further reference to the subject of organ pedalling, I should appreciate the opportunity of replying to Mr. Ellingford's remarks in the May issue of your journal.

The fact that Mr. Ellingford draws our attention to the 'Lemmens Organ School' is interesting insomuch that the possibilities (not hopeful) of oblique angle movement, gliding and placing of the feet, were shown to me by those who themselves were trained upon the modernised version of the lines laid down by Lemmens, who in this work talks about the new method of placing the feet.

With reference to Mr. Ellingford's thirty-four ways of pedalling the passage from the D major Fugue, I regret to say that by far the greater majority of these seem to be merely 'permutations and combinations,' and in practice very awkward, ungainly, and quite impossible to tread naturally, as advocated in the book 'Science of Organ Pedalling'; and further, I would remind Mr. Ellingford of his remarks on p. 57 of this book, in the course of which he says: 'It is this variety of footings to which a passage can be subjected that has brought about so much confusion, and an absence of any reasoned method in treating the footing of the pedal part.'

Further, if we accept the explanation given to 'Feste's' criticism of Ex. 2 in this journal's March issue, p. 221, well and good, but this does not explain the many instances of heel-toe inwards movement on long keys of both feet, and this, I think, was the objection raised in the first place, although it was not put in so many words. This movement, besides being an unnatural one for the feet in treading, often causes fouling, as 'Feste' said in his article 'Organ Pedalling, Past and Present,' and therefore I maintain that for ease and naturalness of execution heel-toe inwards movement should be avoided on all intervals greater than a major second on long keys. Some instances taken at random from the book in question will be found as follows: Part 1, Exx. 30, 55, 56, 58; Part 2, Exx. 2, 8, 9, 18, 26, 29, 56; Part 3, Exx. 16, 17, 18.—Yours, &c.,

R. A. JEVONS.

120, Cazenove Road, N.16.

SIR,—I have only just been able to read 'Feste's' interesting review of the book 'The Science of Organ Pedalling' (Ellingford and Meers), which appeared in the March issue of the Musical Times. I have also just seen the subsequent correspondence in the April and May numbers, and I have been struck by the fact that in connection with the question of giving credit to previous authors who have advocated the liberal use of the heels in pedalling, no one has mentioned the name of Arthur Page.

In his little book 'On Organ Playing' (Vincent Music Co.), Page devotes about a third of his space to the subject of pedal-playing, and insists from the first that the heels should be used as freely as the toes. Not only does he give a complete series of scales (major and minor) 'footed' according to his theory, but he devised special exercises to enable young organists to acquire what the Ellingford-Meers book calls the 'oblique-angle movement' of the feet. I have always considered Page's little book a most excellent one, not only on the subject of pedalling, but also in the other departments of organ-playing with which it deals, and as the first edition of the book was published as long ago as 1899 the author must, I think, be given some credit as a pioneer.

I must plead distance of four thousand miles as an excuse for this somewhat belated contribution to the subject under discussion.—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE D. GOODE.

BRAHMS AS SYMPHONIST

SIR,—Mr. Elliot's article on the above makes the fundamental mistake of supposing that musical criticism has a definite standard on which one can argue. If a man says that Brahms's E minor Symphony is austere, he says it because he feels it; he can prove his feeling with a pianoforte in front of him, or music-type illustrations at his command. But if his audience or readers cannot share his feeling he can only prove it to himself. Brahms's E minor Symphony is as near being a piece of philosophy as music can come, I think; it is a summary of the sternness, the tenderness, and the humour of life; and the last movement was meant to summarise all the preceding material. This is what the music tells me personally, and there is an end of the matter; no possible argument could affect me, any more than my argument can affect the reader who has an entirely different interpretation.

Mr. Elliot's complaint that the C minor Symphony is spoilt by over-emphasis of the dramatic side, and that the D major Symphony is a more perfect work, does not constitute argument, but a statement of the very ordinary fact that he likes the D major better than the C minor—which is interesting, but not conclusive. To me, Brahms wrote one symphony and three fine essays, the first symphony standing alone and having here and there almost the real Beethoven in it; the second, third, and fourth are comparatively—I say comparatively—Mendelssohnian in outlook and result. But of course I cannot prove this to anyone who is, after due consideration, unable to see the music as I see it.

Musical critics have a way of dictating their views with an imperial disregard for their own human weaknesses; they often forget that they have only one pair of ears, and that all their reasoning must be based on what those organs tell them. Brahms's fourth Symphony does not sound austere to Mr. Elliot; but he cannot know what it sounded like to its composer (unless he had the chance of discussing it with him), and it is rubbish to try to prove that it cannot be austere because Brahms is this and is not that.

Incidentally, may one be permitted to ask the writers of musical criticism to write plain English? I almost expected to see at the end of Mr. Elliot's article 'Q.E.D.' If the idea of the writer was to interest the lawyer and the mathematician in Brahms he could not have chosen a better style. Let any of my readers compare the style with that of 'Ad Libitum' or the 'Musician's Bookshelf,' and they will see that the homely style of writing gets very much nearer the point, and probably saves a great deal of space, besides being really interesting.—Yours, &c.,

H. V. SPANNER.

17, Lanercost Road, S.W.2.

SIR,—May I add a few remarks to Mr. J. H. Elliot's article 'Brahms as Symphonist,' in your June number? That the musical public is taking an increasingly intelligent interest in Brahms's orchestral works is shown by the recent gramophone recordings. Eighteen months ago nothing reliable could be obtained. To-day one can have the 'St. Anthony' Variations (H.M.V.) and the Violin Concerto (H.M.V. and Col.). The four Symphonies are all obtainable—three recordings of No. 1 by Stokowski and by Abendroth (H.M.V.) and by Weingartner (Col.); No. 2 conducted by Damrosch (Col.); No. 3 conducted by Stokowski (Victrola); No. 4 by Abendroth (H.M.V.) and by Damrosch (Col.). The possession of these four Symphonies enables a most intimate study of them and reveals, on the whole, a striking uniformity of thematic and developmental treatment. A comparison between the first theme of movement 3 (No. 1) with the first theme of movement 2 (No. 3), and again the development sections of movement 1 (No. 2) and of movement 4 (No. 3), will show what I mean. Can we not imagine a fifth Symphony by Brahms more easily than a tenth by Beethoven? The above recordings of the four Symphonies reveal the beauty and wealth of significant detail which Brahms lavished upon them. I may say I have converted many previously 'anti-Brahmins,' who are now far from accusing Brahms of 'flat-footed pedantry' and of austerity.—Yours, &c.,

ORGAN RECITALS AND THE PRESS

SIR,—I should like to comment on Mr. Kaikhosru Sorabji's letter in the June Musical Times. Whenever I read Mr. Sorabji in the press I feel that he has a grudge against the musical world; his articles are often so very personal and so very bitter. I sympathise with Mr. Sorabji. I have seen his stacks of beautifully bound and printed compositions (printed in Vienna), which anyone would be proud to own and which any owner would want to hear performed. But Kaikhosru Sorabji's music can only be seen. . . . I will cite only a few of his works. I have seen two huge Pianoforte Concertos and the stupendous Organ Symphony. The complete Symphony, Mr. Sorabji told me, would take the full time of an average recital to perform. The texture of these works is extremely complicated, the harmonies decidedly modern; indeed, the criticism I would venture, after hearing part of the third (?) Pianoforte Concerto which Mr. Sorabji played to me, is that within a few bars the resources of the pianoforte (or of the orchestra or the organ) are too fully explored, thus leaving little scope for climax. It is interesting to note that Kaikhosru Sorabji writes straight into full-score all his compositions without making any preliminary sketches—a most remarkable feat of imagination, skill, and confidence. His works have been privately printed with the exception of two, both for pianoforte: 'Le Jardin Parfumé' and the 'Fantaisie Espagnole.' The latter I have thoroughly examined, and it is only after careful study that the structure as well as the ingenuity and original thematic development can be appreciated; for everything that this composer writes is on such a vast and complicated scale. Attention is particularly drawn to Sorabji's ability to write effectively and understandingly for the pianoforte.

I am sure that the 'Fantaisie Espagnole' would make a favourable impression if tackled by a first-rate pianist. It is encouraging to know that Mr. Emlyn Davies has had the courage and skill to perform part of the Organ Symphony.

I associate somehow (and possibly quite wrongly) Sorabji's music with that of Scriabin, though Sorabji has not confined himself to the Scriabin scale and explores a more modern technique. I most sincerely wish that some musical association would give a public performance of a work of this enigmatic giant. May we hope that the B.B.C. will tackle a pianoforte concerto? —Yours, &c., BM/BNXK.

London, W.C.1.

SIR,—In a letter in your June issue Mr. Sorabji wonders whether 'organ recitals are under all and every circumstance, in any place but a concert hall, taboo?' Perhaps it may be because the already over-burdened critic finds it exacting, in addition to the ordinary round of recitals which are specially prepared, to go and listen to an organist who gives a certain number of recitals a year as part of his routine. This may be true in many cases, but not in every one. The critic who thinks thus may occasionally lose an opportunity of recording the fine performance of a very original programme (witness the interesting series of recitals given in past seasons by Mr. Emlyn Davies at Westminster Chapel).

Then, too, omission of reports of organ recitals in the daily press may be due to the unwillingness of the editor to sacrifice valuable space to matter which, he thinks, will interest only the church-going musical public. The report of, say, a pianoforte recital makes a far wider appeal than does that of an organ recital, even though in the former case both programme and performance may be of an inferior quality.

What seems to me a more curious point than that raised by Mr. Sorabji is the question as to how far the organ voluntary has been responsible for the lack of interest taken in the organ and its music by musicians and music-lovers in general. It is often noticeable that the people who throng to a musical festival in a church, and listen most attentively to the programme, will, when one of the great Bach works is played as a voluntary, beat a hurried and noisy retreat, although this may often be the finest music in the scheme. Here is an instance. Some years ago a Purcell Commemoration at Westminster Abbey attracted a crowded attendance. The programme announced at the end an item of greater interest than the ordinary voluntary—the 'Chaconne,' played by a string orchestra. Even so, enjoyment of this by the few was marred by reason of the noise made by the many leaving the church. So far as I can see, such cases as these can only be accounted for by the foolish tradition that some kind of music—good, bad, or indifferent—must 'play the people out.' —Yours, &c., GABRIEL SHARP.

THE HALLÉ SOCIETY

SIR,—As a regular member of the Hallé audience I must protest against Mr. John Russell's defence of Sir Hamilton Harty's programmes in your May issue. If, as he claims, he is one of those who desire to hear more new music, he should keep quiet. But for some reason or other he has taken it upon himself to represent the Hallé Committee, Sir Hamilton Harty, and the Hallé audience, all at the same time. The Committee and Sir Hamilton are apparently incapable of defending themselves, but it must not be thought that Mr. Russell's views represent those of the audience.

In the first place, it is common knowledge that it is not just a small minority but a large and increasing body of opinion which is dissatisfied with the Hallé programmes. What particularly annoys us is that we should be fobbed off with contemporary puerilities by Hely Hutchinson, Bryson, Atterburg, Goldmark, &c., when there is so much serious work by Sibelius, Ravel, Stravinsky, Bax, Holbrooke, and others (not to mention Bartók and Schönberg), aching, as 'C. H.' rightly said, for performance. Are the Sibelius Symphonies considered too cacophonous for the delicate Hallé ears? And what about the neglected Mahler?

It is perfectly possible to give the public what it wants and to educate it at the same time. Mr. Russell is surely not going to suggest that anyone but a fanatic would stay away from a performance of a Brahms Symphony just because Schönberg's Five Orchestral Pieces (for example) are in the same programme? Even if much of the music of to-day is pure experimentalism, as Mr. Russell asserts, it is tolerably certain that when the New Music does arrive we shall be unable to appreciate it until we have travelled with the experimenters; and those that laugh at Honegger will then laugh on the other side of their faces.

At any rate, Sir Henry Wood has succeeded in educating London audiences in all the great modern composers, and I see no reason why Sir Hamilton Harty should fail in this respect.

Mr. Russell refutes his own statement that Manchester's musical culture is unprogressive when he relates how Dr. Richter's retirement came about 'mainly through the attacks of those who would have the modern at all costs.' I venture to predict that the same procedure will happen again before long, if nothing is done about the matter.—Yours, &c.,

The University Union, WILLIAM L. NORMAN.
Manchester.

[We close this correspondence with a quotation from an interview with Sir Hamilton Harty in the Manchester edition of the Daily Express of May 25:

> 'I am going to work on a new policy in the Manchester concerts next year, however. I know I have been accused in the past of neglecting modern works which Manchester people have a right to hear, and preserving a too conservative outlook. Well, I am going to alter all that.
> 'Next season we shall experiment to our heart's content. Previously I have been afraid, partly because I did not think the modern works as good as that music which for convenience we call classical, and partly because I did not feel that the Hallé Society could afford to risk experiments. However, we are going to take our chance.'

We should like to see the Hallé Society take a few chances with Elgar.—EDITOR.]

'VOICE AND VERSE'

SIR,—May I try to explain my point of view concerning the relative popularity of vocal and instrumental concert numbers.

I am not in the least anxious to uphold poor songs or poor singing simply because they are songs or singing—I only contend that as it is evidently the more intimately personal sympathy conveyed and aroused by the human voice which reaches and delights the average audience, so we instrumentalists must try to use our instruments so delicately that they become as nearly as possible like human voices. So long as the vast majority even of very fine pianists persist in regarding the pianoforte as a percussion instrument, instead of realising that it is also a stringed instrument with great possibilities of resonance, nuance, and sustaining tone, just so long will even the mediocre songs be understood and enjoyed, while the beautiful pianoforte music is ignored as lifeless and mechanical —without any 'tune.'

The horrible fashion now rife among pianists of attacking each note of a melodic group as a separate objective, approached from above instead of from its preceding note—deals an inevitable death-blow to the songfulness of great pianoforte music which, treated artistically, can and does hold an audience just as spellbound as the simplest and most popular ballad.—Yours, &c.,

SINGERS' ARTICULATION

SIR,—Kindly allow me to correct an error in my letter in your June issue, p. 538, five lines from the end. It should read: 'C.P. and P.N.P.' ('Cathedral Psalter' and 'Psalter Newly Pointed'). The mistake was, I fear, my own. At the same time I would like to support Mr. Munro Davison upon the subject of 'Singers' Articulation.'

As a teacher, however, equally alive to the importance of the subject, and one who is untiring in his efforts to secure in individuals and choirs a fuller appreciation of word-formation by means of perfectly-shaped vowels and clean-cut consonants, by which alone the full meaning, beauty, and significance of the poetic thought can be conveyed, I feel bound to bear testimony to the extreme difficulty of persuading the great majority of people to do those things which alone will bring the desired result. The national characteristic of hiding the feelings seems to be an insuperable barrier. People can express their own thoughts and feelings naturally enough; but when it comes to interpreting those of someone else, and with the consciousness that others are listening, few seem to be able to break through this reserve and let their imagination have free rein. In short, it is the lack of histrionic ability.

But even if few possess this great gift, there is nothing to prevent anyone—except those with speech-impediment—from acquiring 'good, distinct English'; but it needs thorough attention to detail, persistently applied; and this is another quality which few possess. Hence the few who succeed in getting their words 'over.'—Yours, &c.,

FREDERIC LEEDS.

THE LIGHTNING EFFECT WAS NOT BY MR. MEALE

SIR,—I was unaware of any press reports of my recent recital at Coventry until I read the extract in the June Musical Times, with the highly diverting comments thereon. However, it is high testimony to the alertness of your correspondents.

I must however disclaim any responsibility for the turning out of lights and subsequent flickerings. Doubtless it was the impulsive act of some enthusiastic steward with a love for the dramatic.

I am thankful to think I have sufficient resource as to have no need to resort to scenic effects to make a recital interesting. Not that I should desist if I found it necessary, even though it should provide an occasional opportunity for a little friendly leg-pulling. Wishing you and all readers of the Musical Times a pleasant summer, free of thunderstorms and lightning (still, there will be some who will find interest and exhilaration within reasonable proximity of Vesuvius!)—Yours, &c.,

ARTHUR MEALE.

Hatch End,
Middlesex.

[We print Mr. Meale's letter with pleasure, for two reasons: (1.) It clears him in the matter of those lightning flashes; and (2.) it is an all-too-rare example of the right friendly and sporting way of taking frank and well-meant criticism.—EDITOR.]

A manuscript Sonata for violin and continuo by Bach has recently been discovered. The handwriting is Bach's, and no doubts are felt as to the genuineness of the work. An article on the Sonata, with music-type examples, will appear in our next number.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

The summer term is always a busy one, and this year is no exception to the rule. A more than usually interesting chamber concert was given on Thursday, May 30, in the Duke's Hall. The Academy has at the present time a number of good singers, and two of them, Miss Jean Campbell Kemp, from Glasgow, and Miss May Turtle, from Belfast, gave an almost perfect performance of Saint-Saëns's bolero 'El desdichado.' Both singers sing well, and their voices moreover blend well.

It was interesting to hear two movements of a Violin and Pianoforte Sonata in B flat, by Guirne Creith, played by Jack O'Brien, with the composer at the pianoforte. I have written before about this young student, for she promises to do things some day. In this particular work there are good ideas, but too many of them; in fact, at the moment the composer is a spendthrift, but so much of the writing is good, and much of it tuneful, that it attracts. Two of Arnold Bax's songs were sung well and with understanding by Miss Betty Sheard. On the Monday of the same week two opera performances were given in the Duke's Rehearsal Theatre. The main feature of the enterprise was the fact that the production was entirely done by the students, the producer being Mr. William MacLurg, and that the music of 'Dido and Æneas' had been adapted and orchestrated by Mr. Maurice Miles.

Opinions differ as to the worth of this policy; personally, I have no doubt as to its efficacy. It gives the young actors confidence in their own powers, and by inviting the critics they are able to see where the performances might be bettered. But the criticism should be constructive and not destructive. The performance on the whole was admirable; but there were differences of opinion between the orchestra and chorus here and there. Miss Kemp and Mr. Geoffrey Davies, as the heroine and hero, both sang and acted well. The ballet was most effective, and the lighting and stage-work generally reached excellence. Purcell's work was followed by 'The Blue Peter,' a one-Act opera by C. Armstrong Gibbs. The music is clever, crisply written, and very tuneful.

The orchestral concert at Queen's Hall took place on Tuesday afternoon, June 11. It was a plucky thing to 'put up' the Prelude and first scene of the third Act of 'Götterdämmerung,' and the result justified the adventure. Under Sir Henry Wood the large orchestra gave a highly creditable performance of the Prelude, and the quartet sang remarkably well. Especially is this true of the three students—Miss Jean Campbell Kemp, Miss Irene Morden, and Miss Valetta Iacopi. All three have beautiful voices, and Miss Iacopi is an exceptionally good contralto. Mr. Topping was at times overwhelmed by the orchestra—Queen's Hall is not Covent Garden. All these young singers are pupils of Mr. Thomas Meux, himself a Wagnerian stalwart of the Richter régime.

Among the audience was Mr. Glazounov, and he heard an excellent performance of his Violin Concerto in A minor, in which Mr. Sydney Griller played the solo part.

The Opera Class will give its annual opera week at the New Scala Theatre from Monday to Saturday, July 8-13. The operas to be presented are Verdi's 'Rigoletto,' Puccini's 'La Bohème,' and German's 'Merrie England.' Mr. Julius Harrison will conduct, and the producers are Mr. L. Cairns James and Miss Isobel McLaren. The performances will begin at 8 o'clock each evening.

The following awards have been made: Lionel Tertis Viola Prize to Eileen Grainger (Gloucester); Sir Edward Cooper Prize (ensemble) to David Taylor (first violin), Watson Forbes (second violin), Percy Dyer (viola), and David Thomas ('cello); Matthew Phillimore Prize (male pianists) to Robert Edwards (London), Yelland Richards being highly commended; Piatti Prize ('cello) to Colin Hampton (London), Ruth L. Pirie and David Thomas being highly commended; Charles Lucas Prize (composition) to R. Norman Fulton (London); Cuthbert Nunn Prize (composition) to Dorothy Parke (Londonderry), Marjorie Playne, Muriel G. Crowther, and Margaret Judd being commended; Frederick Westlake Memorial Prize (male pianists) to Yelland Richards (Leighton Buzzard).

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC

The outstanding concerts of the past month were two given by the First and Second Orchestras. At the former, Sibelius's rarely-heard Symphony in C and Respighi's brilliant impressions of the Fountains of Rome were the principal features, the performance, under Dr. Malcolm Sargent, reflecting the highest credit on the orchestra, which displayed remarkable beauty of tone and considerable artistic perception. The concerto was Lalo's 'Cello Concerto, an exacting and in many respects unsatisfying work, dexterously handled by the soloist, Maurice Hardy. The Second Orchestra, besides giving young conductors the customary opportunities, had the enviable distinction of producing for the first time a vocal orchestral work by a woman student, Betty Lutyens. It proved to be a composition of much charm and something more than promise, with many encouraging signs of further possibilities for the composer.

Mid-day recitals have once more proved an attraction, conspicuous among them being one given on the viola d'amore by Miss Violet P. Brough, whose musical and sympathetic performances on the instrument are familiar to broadcast listeners.

In the Parry Opera Theatre two performances were given by the Dramatic Class, under the guidance of Mr. Cairns James, of Ian Hay's riverside comedy, 'A Happy Ending,' with alternate casts. On both occasions they displayed a style and finish rarely associated with students' work. The Operatic Class gave three performances of 'The Magic Flute,' conducted by Sir Thomas Beecham and Mr. Aylmer Buesst, and produced by Mr. H. Procter Gregg. The class made great efforts to prove themselves worthy of the confidence reposed in them by Sir Thomas Beecham, and succeeded in exhibiting many novel points of individuality and distinction.

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC

The work of the College is going on steadily. The rehearsals for the performance of 'Monsieur Beaucaire' at the Scala Theatre on July 4, 5, and 6, give promise of an excellent entertainment.

The Controller of Examinations, Mr. Edward d'Evry, proposes to visit South Africa in the summer vacation, and will assist in the College examinations there.

It is gratifying to note that a cable of condolence with the College at the death of the late Principal, Prof. J. C. Bridge, was received from the Premier of New South Wales and the Conservatorium of Music in that State.

It is with regret that the sudden death is noted of Mrs. Richardson, the energetic local secretary of the Grimsby centre, where she will be much missed.

Distributions have been held at Bath, Folkestone, and Wrexham.

The lecture by Mr. Hubert Foss on 'The Later Works of John Ireland,' at Grotrian Hall, attracted a large and interested audience.

Competition Festival Record

CO-OPERATIVE CHORAL FESTIVAL

A new Festival was held at the Crystal Palace on May 11 by a joint organization of some of the larger co-operative societies in the London area. Six competitions were opened, and the entries totalled sixty-seven, representing forty-one choirs. Prizes were won by choirs from Enfield Highway, Croydon, Sheerness, and, in a junior class with fifteen entries, Woolwich. Choirs also came from Brighton, Swindon, Rochester, and Chelmsford.

BRIGHTON (May 25-31).—At the fifth Festival there were fifteen hundred entries, largely spread over a number of well-supported solo classes. The proportion of choirs and other group bodies to the total was larger than is usually found in southern Festivals, and the adjudicators gave high praise to their work. In the competition for mixed-voice choirs of forty to sixty voices there were only two choirs, Shoreham Choral Society being first, but there were five choirs in the class for twenty-five to forty voices, the prize going to Wellington Square Choral Society, Hastings. Apollo Choir, Chichester, was best of four male-voice choirs, Brighton Municipal Training College the better of two female-voice choirs. Some good singing on the part of elementary school children resulted in awards for Sussex Street Boys' School, Brighton, out of six entries, and St. John's Senior Girls' School, Brighton, out of four entries. The British Legion Women's Choir, Hastings, was first of four in the class for Women's Institutes and Societies. Military and Brass Bands were a strong feature. London Bands prevailed on the opening Saturday, but a week later the Brighton Borough Police Band won against four Metropolitan Police Bands. The award for string orchestras went to the Symphonic Players' Training Orchestra, Brighton.

CHELTENHAM (May 9-11).—This four-year-old Festival is growing in importance and gradually raising choral singing in the neighbouring countryside to an artistic standard. In the working-out of an all-round syllabus nothing sensational occurred, but the general level was creditable. The promise of a fine male-voice contest came to nothing, for three out of five choirs failed to appear and a fourth was a 'sporting' entry; Malvern Wells Choir (Mr. J. H. L. Gauntlett) was able to win easily. 'A Cheltonian Choir' (Mrs. P. J. Taylor) won in the female-voice class, Cam Choral Society (Mrs. E. F. Thomas) in the village choir and choral society classes. One of the most successful features was a competition in ten-minute camp-fire programmes for Scouts and Guides. There were forty elocutionists under twelve years of age.

HITCHIN (May 9-11).—The North and East Herts Festival, with its twenty classes for choirs (out of a total of thirty-one) is now an important choral meeting. Although the area is small, so much choral activity is contained in it that the Festival is not easily to be accommodated except at Hitchin, and here the Festival is to be held again next year. In the chief mixed-voice class the Hatfield Choir was first and Welwyn second; Hatfield was also first in the male-voice class, and first prizes were won by Hatfield G.F.S., Hatfield Church Choir, and the orchestra of St. Audrey's School, Hatfield. Welwyn, Essendon, Harpenden, Baldock, Letchworth, and Hitchin Choirs also played a prominent part.

HULL (May 25, May 28-June 1).—This Festival upholds sight-reading (a hundred and thirty choirs and fifty soloists), and the own-choice principle in prepared tests. Several classes had both a prescribed test and a second test left to the competitors' choice, an arrangement which adds to the entertainment-value of the competitions. Entries were more numerous than ever before, the number of the competitors running probably to five figures. The opening day was occupied, very effectively and successfully, with children's folk-dancing. Children's choral singing occupied a large part of the later proceedings, and some very good performances were heard—Hull again ranking high as a juvenile Festival. The most successful choir was that of Hessle Council School (Mr. H. Calvert), which won three first prizes and one second. Other distinctions were won by Blenkin Street School Senior Choir (boys) and Crowle Street School (girls), both for two-part singing. Among the adults the chief successes were won by Needlers' Musical Society (Mr. Edgar T. Sales), first in the female-voice and mixed-voice classes. The chief prize for solo singing, competed for by the winners in various classes, was won by Miss Madge Morfitt, of Hull (soprano). Mr. Edward Lavin (baritone) was first in a class for Lieder singing, the competitors' 'own-choice' being allowed to range through Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, and Wolf.

MAIDSTONE (May 22 and 25, June 1).—Last year, at Folkestone, the Kent Festival attained its record of well over seven hundred entries. This year, at Maidstone, the number dropped to five hundred and seventy, owing probably to the shifting of the local appeal rather than to a general set-back. The competitions were still well-contested and interesting. New classes were open to choirs numbering eight to fifteen voices; one of these, for male voices, was won by a choir that competed in and won a class for larger mixed choirs—Lyminge Choral Society, conducted by Miss E. Jacob. The other was won by the Women's Institute of Ickham, Littlebourne, and Wickhambreux, conducted by Mr. J. Reid. The winning female-voice choir in the senior class was that of Maidstone Choral Union, conducted by Mr. F. Wilson Parish. The prizes for orchestral playing were won by Hartlip (villages under 2,000), Willesborough and District Labour Club (villages of 2,000-5,000), and the 'Old Barn Orchestra,' Sandling (towns).

RYDE, I.O.W. (June 3-8).—The increasing popularity of this Festival, which brought in over a thousand entries, necessitated an extension to six days. The chief choral competitions were held in mid-week. Ryde School of Music, holder of the prize for choral societies of not more than forty singers, maintained its place against Bembridge Choral Society, West Wight Choral Union, and Ventnor Philharmonic. Six female-voice choirs made an excellent competition, Newport Ladies' Choir being first by six marks. In the class for larger choirs Newport Philharmonic, the holder, was placed above Shanklin Philharmonic, Ryde Philharmonic, and Sandown Choral Society. Newport Gleemen were successful over their only rival, Ryde Male-Voice Choir. One of the best features of the Festival was the size of the audiences.

TRURO (May 15-18).—The Cornwall Festival now brings its thousand entries and a number of keenly contested choral classes, in which sight-reading takes a prominent part. In the chief mixed-voice class the order of the three competing choirs was the same in the prepared and unprepared tests—Penryn Choral Society first, Truro Musical Society second, and St. Mawes Choral Society third. In the male-voice class positions were changed; Mabe Choir, which was third to Truro People's Palace Choir and Newlyn West in the test-pieces, was first in sight-reading. Truro Musical Society was first in madrigal-singing. Competitions for Women's Institutes, &c., were well supported, and there was a good display of school singing, St. Austell County School being prominent. A Haydn Symphony was played by St. Meriadoc Orchestra, Camborne (first), and by Falmouth Music Club (second).

There were also held the Suffolk County Festival, at BURY (May 10 and 11); the second annual GOLDTHORPE Festival (May 18 and 20); the competitions of the MATLOCK BATH Musical Festival Society (June 7 and 8); the Norfolk Festival, at NORWICH (May 8-11); the PETERBOROUGH and District Festival (May 31 and June 1); the ninth Thanet Festival, at RAMSGATE (June 5 and 6); and the competitions of the National Temperance Choral Union, at the Crystal Palace, on June 8. Children's Festivals were held by the Staffordshire Musical Association, at STAFFORD (May 13-16), and by the Essex Musical Association, at BECONTREE (June 5); the first Children's National Eisteddfod was held at CORWEN early in June. ALDERNEY held its first Eisteddfod on May 27 and 28.

SCOTLAND

BANFFSHIRE.—The third Banffshire Festival was held at Buckie, and ran for four days. The interest of the competitors and of the public continued to be keen, but attendances in the earlier stages were affected by the General Election. Principal awards: Mixed Choirs, Buckie Operatic Society; Women's Choirs, Cullen Ladies' Choir and Buckie Ladies' Choir; Church Choirs, North U.F. Church, Keith; Junior Choirs, Buckie Secondary School; School Choirs, Macduff Higher Grade School, Cullen Higher Grade School, Portsoy Public School, St. Thomas's School, Portsoy, Culvie, and Enzie Public Schools; Girl Guide Choirs, Keith; Women's Rural Institute Choirs, Arradoul; Scottish Country Dancing, Cullen Girl Guides and Arradoul Women's Rural Institute; Vocal Solos: (General) Miss Nen Paterson, Buckie; (Scots) Miss Nen Paterson, Buckie; (Hebridean) Miss Nan Taylor, Buckie; Pianoforte Solos, Miss Barbara Main, Burghead; Violin Solos, Miss Violet Dawson, Fochabers.

EDINBURGH.—The tenth Edinburgh Festival ran for eight days at Edinburgh, and occupied forty-six sessions with a hundred and forty-one classes. Interest among competitors was keen, but was not widely shared by the general public. Principal awards: Mixed Choirs, Kilmarnock Lyric Choir, Dalkeith Choral Union, and the Menzies Choir; Men's Choirs, Cambuslang Male-Voice Choir and Edinburgh Police Choir; Women's Choirs, Edinburgh Ladies' Gaelic Choir and Longniddry and Macmerry Women's Rural Institute; Church Choirs, Pilrig Church, Edinburgh, and St. John's U.F. Church, Leith; School Choirs, North Berwick School, Bristo School, Edinburgh, Milton House School, Edinburgh, St. James's School, Edinburgh, Tynecastle School, Edinburgh; Junior Choirs, North Berwick School; String Orchestras, Miss Isobel Marshall's String Orchestra, Glasgow; String Quartets, H.L.B. Quartet, Eskbank; Eurhythmics, Notre Dame School, Glasgow: Lieder, Roderick M'Leod and John Hunter Anstruther; Vocal Solos: (General) Miss Edith Menzies, Newport; (Scots) Miss Isabel Davidson, Kirkcaldy; (Operatic) Miss Betty Adams, Dalkeith; Pianoforte Solos, Miss Gwen M'Gill, Edinburgh; Violin Solos, Miss Maisie Johnston, Duns; 'Cello Solos, Miss Marjorie A. Ballantyne, Eskbank; Organ Solos, J. V. Bateman.

GALLOWAY.—The tenth Galloway Festival was held at Newton-Stewart. Principal awards: Mixed Choirs, Kirkcudbright Choral Society and Dalry Musical Association; Men's Choirs, Kirkcudbright Choral Society; Women's Choirs, Kirkcudbright Choral Society; Rural Institute Choirs, Dalry; Church Choirs, St. John's Church, Newton-Stewart, and Crossmichael Church; School Choirs, Douglas-Ewart School, Newton-Stewart, Penninghame School, Twynholm School, Parton School; Guides' and Brownies' Choirs, Stranraer Guides, Kirkmabreck Guides, Mochrum Brownies.

London Concerts

THE PHILHARMONIC CHOIR

Arnold Bax's contributions to choral music, beginning with 'Mater ora filium' in 1921, have been few but choice. His latest 'Walsinghame,' for tenor solo, chorus, and orchestra, will therefore be sure of a welcome, if only because it is a piece of true modern music which is none the less firmly rooted in the English choral tradition. Its first performance by the Philharmonic Choir at Queen's Hall, on June 6, showed that, though it is probably not the best of them, this latest essay in the combination of modern music with ancient words is a worthy companion to its predecessors. The orchestral introduction is chromatic, and reflects, in the manner of 'Tristan,' the uneasy longings of the love that is 'lost with a toy'; the unaccompanied verse is broad and diatonic, and shows the love that is a 'durable fire.' It is a noble 16th-century poem, and this setting is remarkable for the way in which Bax has woven its two component strands of thought into a single whole.

The concert began with one of the most brilliant performances that the 'Hymn of Jesus' can ever have had. Holst puts all his effects into the music itself, and they can hardly fail to 'come off,' but the 'Hymn of Jesus' sometimes sounds like a disintegrated series of such effects. In this performance Mr. Kennedy Scott held it together by well-judged tempi and a tight rhythm, so that the swiftness and unity of its conception were dazzlingly evident. Tightness and swiftness were instantly banished for the performance of Delius's 'Song of the High Hills,' which is an orchestral rather than a choral tone-poem. To this score Mr. Kennedy Scott brought some of the insight and flexibility with which he elucidates Elizabethan vocal music and gave, if one may say so without offence, an unexpectedly revealing performance of its many characteristic beauties, for Delius, unlike Holst, is not a composer who yields his message by merely playing the notes.

The Philharmonic Choir was in magnificent form at this concert, and sang with the virtuosity but without the self-conscious effort of some of the Northern crack choirs.

ORIANA MADRIGAL SOCIETY

Elizabethan music is even now not of daily occurrence in the public practice of the art, but its position to-day is very much more assured than it was twenty-five years ago, when Mr. Kennedy Scott and the Oriana Madrigal Society started pioneering with it. This society has since been able to extend its attention to modern choral music, so well have its primary aims been accomplished. On May 28 it celebrated its twenty-fifth birthday appropriately with an exclusively Elizabethan programme, of which the chief feature was Byrd's four-part Mass. This was beautifully sung with the greatest flexibility of time and phrasing and admirable variety of tone (a solo quartet was employed to this end). Special insight is required with this placid-looking music to reveal the abundant life which it possesses, and this Mr. Scott has to a pre-eminent degree on account of his long experience in dealing with it.

The selection of madrigals which came at the end of the programme, and included Weelkes's expressive 'Death hath deprived me,' was similarly treated with the utmost variety of resource. A number of interesting rounds and popular songs from Ravenscroft were happily sung in the same untrammelled way. Between the two vocal parts of the programme Miss Harriet Cohen played some virginal music on the pianoforte. Her modern pre-occupation with variety of tone-colour resulted in revealing some of the beauties of the part-writing of these little pieces, but her selection was not very happy, since it obscured the abundant variety that is really to be found among this primitive keyboard music. There were too many grave and slow dances, and not enough Variations or examples of the more lively jeux d'esprit.

GOOSSENS—STRAVINSKY CONCERT

A large audience gave a warm welcome to Eugène Goossens at Queen's Hall, on June 19—his first appearance in London for some years. He had an orchestra of a hundred and ten—opulence to which London is rarely treated in these lean times. Brahms's fourth Symphony, finely played, showed that Mr. Goossens had developed greatly during his busy years in America. Perhaps there was a touch of the Transatlantic in his apparent determination to make the symphony sound vivid, but the extra touch of colour and brilliance were no more than such works often need if they are to be as vital to us as they were to our forbears. The kernel of the concert should have been the Stravinsky Pianoforte Concerto, which was given its first performance here, but it proved to be a very dry pip indeed. The medium, no less than the idiom, was responsible for this aridity. The composer eschewed all the strings save the double-basses, on the ground (I quote the programme note) of 'accentuating both the objective nature of the music and the percussive characteristics of the solo instrument, which would have been, so to speak, contradicted by the inflexional expression of string tone.' Stravinsky's desire to avoid the expressive was completely successful. Some promise of beauty and feeling seemed imminent occasionally—e.g., at the start of the slow movement—but it was always knocked on the head promptly by a return to desiccated classicism. The idiom was mainly polyphonic, and the effect as a whole that of a Bach clavier concerto with the wind parts slightly askew. Stravinsky played the pianoforte part deftly, and was applauded loud and long. It was clear that he still stands for much with the bright young folk, but they are not likely to hear this Concerto often—or even again. The programme ended with Respighi's 'Roman Festivals,' a highly descriptive work heard here for the first time.

G.

BEATRICE HARRISON

Miss Beatrice Harrison played Dvorák's 'Cello Concerto at Queen's Hall on June 14, and, with her sister May, Delius's Double Concerto. Sir Thomas Beecham conducted. Delius's work had probably never before had so sympathetic a performance. It is no doubt not one of his finest masterpieces, but this time it was proved to be certainly not dull music. The soloists evidently knew it all intimately, and the conductor divined the right tempos and the essential melodies. It was, as well as a pleasure, a useful experience, for when in future Delius seems monotonous or shapeless we shall feel we know where to put the blame. In Dvorák's melodious and delightful Concerto Miss Harrison played with all her skill and refinement. A new Poem ('The Melodist and the Nightingale') by Cyril Scott had had as its inspiration Miss Harrison's exploit in persuading the Surrey nightingales to sing for the B.B.C. Into this descriptive piece the composer has not put the best of his talent.

ANGEL GRANDE'S CHAMBER ORCHESTRA

Mr. Angel Grande's concert at the Faculty of Arts, in John Street, proved of more than usual interest, there being three new works on the programme. Poulenc's 'Trois Airs Chantés' are graceful essays in the neo-classical manner which this French composer, who must now be considered to have put his youth behind him, has already cultivated with no little originality. Miss Hortense Houghton sang them with a due appreciation of their esprit, and later in the evening demonstrated her skill in contributing to a really brilliant performance of 'Rout,' which we can now appreciate as a mosaic of many styles put together with a craftsmanship that amounts to genius. The other two novelties were Mr. Herbert Bedford's Suite de Ballet, 'Peribanon,' vivid and amusing, but necessarily sounding somewhat disjointed in a concert-room performance, and Malipiero's 'Grottesco,' a pretentious and rather dull affair. In both of these Mr. Busch made the most of the pianoforte parts that occupy a prominent place in the scores. Mr. Angel Grande's conducting is forceful and dynamic, and the playing of his orchestra faithfully reflects his qualities.

ISOLDE MENGES AND HAROLD SAMUEL

The final concert of the series given by Miss Isolde Menges and Mr. Harold Samuel at Æolian Hall was devoted to concertos, which were accompanied by a string orchestra under Mr. Herbert Menges. The violinist played a concerto by Nardini, and Vaughan Williams's 'Concerto Accademico.' The latter is one of the best works the composer has written, and now that it has been published one hopes that its merits will be recognised. The slow movement, which is at once classical in design and modern in feeling, is a most beautiful piece of music, and the Finale is original and most effective. Miss Menges played it with her customary assurance and straightforwardness, but the two quick movements, especially the first, require more vivacity and lightness of touch. Mr. Samuel's performance of Bach's short Concerto in F minor was wholly delightful. His second contribution to the programme was Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso for pianoforte and strings, whose showiness, so effective at a first hearing, does not survive the test of more familiar acquaintance. Vaughan Williams's music may be homespun stuff, but it has more hard wear in it than this glowing fabric of artificial silk.

DOLMETSCH

The five Dolmetsch concerts at Grotrian Hall in the second week of June covered, necessarily in rather summary fashion, the two centuries of musical history that ends with John Sebastian Bach. Two whole programmes were devoted entirely to that Master. One of the most interesting features was a 'Brandenburg' Concerto, where the timbres of the individual instruments, including harpsichord, viole de gamba, and violone, and their general balance, reproduced the composer's intentions, which are treated with scant regard in so many of our concert-halls.

On this programme was also a Prelude for the lute, of which Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch, who has been gallantly wrestling with its difficulties for some years, has now attained sufficient mastery to convince one that in sheer loveliness of tone it is unsurpassable. The other Bach concert was given up to his clavier music, and included a masterly performance of the 'Goldberg Variations' on the harpsichord, by Rudolph Dolmetsch, and the Chromatic Fantasia, which Arnold Dolmetsch played on the clavichord. Of these old instruments, the clavichord with its Virgilian tenderness must rank next to the lute in the affections of musical antiquaries.

Another favourite with Dolmetsch audiences are the recorders, which contributed two charming pieces for a consort of five of these instruments by Anthony Holborne, who has been dubbed the Lord Berners of Elizabethan music.

One rarely goes to concerts given by Mr. Dolmetsch without being introduced to some old composer whose acquaintance one desires further. The most remarkable thing we heard during the recent series was, perhaps a Fantasy for five viols by Diego Ortiz, a Toledan who flourished in the middle of the 16th century. This treated the viola da gamba part with a range and freedom that anticipated the treatment of the instrument a century later. A very fine example of solo writing for the seven-stringed viola da gamba at the time when this instrument was in its heyday was the unaccompanied Suite by Demachy (not Giuseppe, but a contemporary of Marais), played by Rudolph Dolmetsch. During the course of these concerts this young musician performed on half-a-dozen different instruments, and seemed equally at home on all of them.

H. E. W.

HEIFETZ

The two recitals given by Heifetz at Queen's Hall did nothing to cause us to modify the opinion we had formed of his abilities. At the first he played only music worth one side of a gramophone record. Ernst's Concerto may need two; it deserves not more than one. The second programme boasted of Mendelssohn's Concerto—a classical work which should have enabled the listener to establish some kind of comparison between Heifetz and other players of the same class. It was not to be, however. The moment the theme passed to the pianoforte, and the violin started on a passage requiring technical effort, Heifetz took the bit between his teeth and raced off; Mendelssohn was left behind, and we were given instead an exhibition of brilliant but purposeless fireworks. It is true that the second subject was taken twice as slowly as anybody else ever thought of taking it; unfortunately the time here lost did not make amends for the time gained by the speed of the passage work. Thus Heifetz must still be ranked amongst the technicians pure and simple. Even he, however, found a couple of passages in the Ernst Concerto very trying. F. B.

THIBAUD

There are times when Thibaud's playing gives rise to considerable doubts, when, in spite of its brilliancy, it seems to sum up all it has to say in the first five minutes. On his last visit however the French violinist was in his best form, and the concert he gave at Queen's Hall must be considered the most interesting he has given here so far. Nachez's arrangement of Vivaldi's Concerto in A minor is a cold-blooded affair, and the poetic elements of Chausson's 'Poème' have been so often translated in prosaic terms by inexpert interpreters that its performance arouses more anxiety than hope. Thibaud, however, cast his spell in both compositions, and the Concerto, if not specially attractive, became at least alive and interesting, while the 'Poème,' presented with some restraint and measure, seemed more like a musical composition and less like a party manifesto than usual. In the Schubert Fantasie, Thibaud's dash and finish told with great effect, but his reading of Mozart's Sonata in B flat was more 'gallant' than tender. F. B.

SOPHIE PIMENIDES

Miss Sophie Pimenides, a young Greek violinist who appeared at Wigmore Hall on May 30, showed a decided talent. Her tone was round and her intonation accurate. Generally her playing was rhythmical, though she did not punctuate the phrases in the fast movements of the Sonata by Nardini with sufficient clearness. She was heard to the best advantage in Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole,' whose lively rhythms suited her vigorous style. Miss Pimenides shared the recital with a singer of whom the less said the better. D. H.

ZIGHERA

It was a mistake to include Handel and Mozart in the programme of the recital given by the French violinist, Léon Zighera, at the Court House, Marylebone. The more robust aspects of Handel's music he can interpret to perfection, but not the subtler shades of colour and emotion embodied, for instance, in the third brief movement of the Sonata in A. Mozart will never reveal his qualities under the stress of so coarse a vibrato as that of Zighera. But give him less intimate stuff, like the two fairly interesting but undistinguished modern compositions he played in the second part of his programme, and he will get through them with as much credit as anybody. Zighera played to a small audience in a small hall. Violinists not more skilled technically, nor more intellectual, have brought together very fair audiences at Queen's Hall. F. B.

EILEEN WRIGHT AND HAROLD CRAXTON

This recital of sonatas for violin and pianoforte, given at Wigmore Hall on June 4, proved a rather one-sided affair. Miss Eileen Wright is still too little assured of herself and of her technique to show whether she possesses the personality necessary for the performance of music in public. Her tone was pleasant, though on the small side, and she played the simpler melodic passages in John Ireland's second Sonata gracefully enough. Mr. Craxton's qualities as a pianist are too well known to need comment, and the occasion did not provide a real opportunity of judging his capabilities in this particular form of music. D. H.

HILDEGARD ARNOLD

The 'cello playing of Miss Hildegard Arnold has a very pretty character of its own. It is tender, gracious, neat, and technically efficient. It is heard in perfection in music of the type of Boccherini's Sonata in A major. In Bach it seemed to lack vigour, and occasionally it suffered from a faulty interpretation. The great climax to the Andante of the D major Sonata (for 'cello and pianoforte) loses its force when the 'little' notes are neglected and under-rated. But it was surprising to find this very gentle player doing full justice later to the emotional qualities of Bax's Sonata for 'cello and pianoforte. This performance held out promise of still greater things, and one feels confident that the promise will be redeemed in time. F. B.

BARJANSKY

Mr. Alexandre Barjansky is a 'cellist who belongs to the rhapsodical school. His collaboration with Mr. Howard-Jones therefore in a recital at Æolian Hall, on May 24, looked at first as though it would be a failure from sheer lack of like-mindedness, since Mr. Howard-Jones is not rhapsodical but restrained to the point of fastidiousness. The latter part of the programme, however, contained Delius's Sonata and four vivid pieces by Bloch, which are suited to Mr. Barjansky's sweeping phrases and full tone. Pianist and 'cellist, after a complete disagreement over two adaptations of Bach, had reached agreement in the slow movement of Beethoven's D major Sonata, so that a very positive success was brought out of a doubtful beginning. In exuberant music Mr. Barjansky is a 'cellist who takes a lot of beating, for he has all the chief virtues of a string-player—pure intonation, copious tone, and flexible phrasing. F. H.

BAUER

Harold Bauer 're-appeared' at Wigmore Hall after a considerable interval and played, in many ways, like the master he is. I hope it is not heresy to add that in one way he played rather unlike the master he was. Mastery of the instrument, mastery in the sense of understanding, he showed on his recent visit as he showed an hundred times before. But while once he took the composer's word as final, Bauer to-day seems now and then to argue the point. If Brahms in his waltzes condescends to play very gracefully with a popular form, Bauer, with a little touch here and another little touch there, will make it less popular. Similarly in the Schubert Sonata some effects seemed far-fetched. But the Finale was played most exquisitely, and only a great pianist could have given us performances of such wonderful variety and wealth of tone-gradation. F. B.

PHILIP LÉVI

Mr. Philip Lévi played less well than usual at his recital at Grotrian Hall on May 31. He seemed unable to play a movement through as a whole, but let it fall into sections. In view of this impression created by his performance of familiar things like Schumann's Symphonic Studies, it is perhaps unfair to accuse Busoni's Variations and Fugue upon Chopin's Prelude in C minor of being disjointed, since this may also have been due to the performance. The Variations were composed when Busoni was in his twentieth year, and in spite of an obvious indebtedness to Brahms's method of handling the variation form, show an originality and a bigness of conception which are remarkable in so young a man. The Fugue is a masterly piece of writing, a real precursor of the intellectual and compact style of Busoni's later music, and not the academic exercise which might be expected from a youth at the beginning of his career. After this work Mr. Lévi's own 'Sonatina Umoristica' sounded entirely insignificant, and we could discover no justification for its title. D. H.

JOHN GOSS

It is no disparagement of the many excellent concerts which Mr. John Goss has given previously to say that he surpassed them in his recital at Wigmore Hall on June 3. His actual singing was technically better.

He went out of tune at the cadence of 'I care not for these ladies,' but his tone was fuller and less nasal. On the artistic side his judgment did not fail once in a programme which set out to explore all the odd corners of the art of song. He excelled all his former efforts in framing recondite programmes, since of twenty-three songs, most of them unfamiliar and with no sort of connection or resemblance between them, all were 'winners' and most of them in the first class in quality. Loder's 'Brooklet,' Haydn's 'Englisches Nationenlied,' Franz's 'Marie,' and Stravinsky's difficult 'Pastorale' may be mentioned as having each in a different way revealed Mr. Goss's powers of interpretation and his versatility. F. H.

MARY JARRED

Miss Mary Jarred, who sang at Æolian Hall on June 3, confirmed the very favourable opinion created by her first recital. Her voice has the true contralto quality, and, with the exception that her intonation is not absolutely faultless, her technique is far above the average of the young singers who see fit to make public appearances. If Miss Jarred can ensure that she will always reach the true note and will develop her powers of interpretation, which are at present too limited in range, she should become a singer of note, for she possesses the rare combination of intelligence and a beautiful voice. Miss Jarred was particularly successful in Brahms's two songs with viola (Miss Rebecca Clarke) and pianoforte, which were also the best songs in her programme. Mr. George Reeves played the pianoforte accompaniments excellently, and Mr. Roger Quilter accompanied the singer in a group of his songs, most of which did not represent him at his best. D. H.

FFRANGCON DAVIES—PARKER

Perhaps it all comes of associations. We have seen Mr. Robert Parker so often on the stage that when he sang Brahms's 'Ernste Gesänge' at Æolian Hall, one was a little fearful lest he should break off these grave meditations and address us in the words of Tonio of 'Pagliacci.' But in admitting our own frailty, it must also be added that Mr. Parker did nothing to allay our fears. His tone was harsh; his rhythms questionable; he suggested nothing so much as a Lieder-singer malgré lui. Perhaps he was not in very good form; perhaps songs are not as familiar to him as opera. Miss Marjorie Ffrangcon Davies on the other hand seemed in high spirits, and whenever the music suited her mood, the performance was distinctly promising. But she has yet some work to do before she can be a mature artist both in respect of method of singing and of interpretative art. F. B.

COVENT GARDEN OPERA

To complete the record of the German season an extra performance of 'Walküre' is to be mentioned, the special interest in which lay in the important work done by British artists. Albert Coates conducted, Miss Florence Austral was the Brünnhilde, and Walter Widdop the Siegmund. As an impersonation, the Brünnhilde was rather too placid; but vocally (although Miss Austral was unwell) it was a magnificent performance. This glorious voice was made for Wagner's heroic music. Mr. Widdop distinguished himself. He sang in German, and this was, of course, a handicap. It caused a certain stiffness in the performance. But Mr. Widdop has the gifts to make a nearly ideal Siegmund. The music does not lie too high for his fine, robust voice, and he is to be credited with honestly singing it, every phrase. He certainly eclipses most of the German tenors heard at Covent Garden. He is a singer we may be proud of.

The Italian season began with 'Don Giovanni,' sung by a mixed cast under Mr. Barbirolli. Don Giovanni (Mariano Stabile), Zerlina (Elisabeth Schumann), and Ottavio (Heddle Nash) were the best individual performances. Stabile was brilliant; it is a pity that this artist is under-rated in certain quarters. The cruelty of the character was exactly expressed in the singer's tone-quality. The Champagne song could hardly have been better sung. Mr. Nash made his reputation by beautifully finished singing of the two difficult tenor arias. The Elvira and Anna were Miss Miriam Licette and a newcomer, Madame Anne Roselle. Neither was quite equal to the splendid opportunity, though one could listen with interest and pleasure to everything. The Leporello (Autori) was unfortunately a rough singer. Mr. Barbirolli did well. He had a good idea of the tempos, and kept them going with a firm hand. The moderate pace of 'Madamina' (which was badly sung) was to be commended. The whole performance was something to be grateful for.

The numerous waits for the changes of scene are, however, a drawback to the masterpiece as performed at Covent Garden, where the audience is not grateful (as at Continental opera houses) for opportunities for social intercourse. Londoners desire shows that go with the continuity of the cinema. In view of this temper, some different method of production is required for operas with many scenes. People similarly got impatient in 'Boris,' as they would not have done anywhere else in Europe.

'Norma' was revived the next night with Madame Rosa Ponselle, a newcomer, in the title-part. There is stately and charming lyrical music in this neglected opera. Perhaps some of the quick movements are a little cheap; but Bellini's best cantabile subjects are very beautiful. The whole opera is, given first-rate singing, something not to be missed, though it seems rather long. Madame Ponselle proved herself a fine singer and a serious, somewhat self-conscious artist. A certain mannerism in her production, which it would be tiresome to describe at length, prevented her from making a sweeping, all-victorious effect; but she is certainly a dramatic soprano much out of the ordinary. The mezzo-soprano part (Adalgisa) was sung by Madame Minghini-Cattaneo, who had a fine powerful voice, but an imperfect style.

Madame Ponselle also sang with distinction in Ponchielli's 'Gioconda.' The great merit of this opera is the opportunity it gives for full-throated singing on the part of half a dozen principal characters. The music is not that of a great genius, but it has more qualities than were generally allowed in London last month. The fact is, a more careful production was necessary.

'Gioconda' presents a passionate intrigue in a rich setting of Renaissance Venice. Great spirit and conviction in the performance are wanted to carry the hearer over any question of improbability. Tameness and conventionality invite ridicule. The conductor, Vincenzo Bellezza, was not to be accused of tameness—he is rather rough and blustering. But the production as a whole was a makeshift. A thoroughly well-prepared and excitingly sung 'Gioconda' would probably win for the opera many friends among those who do not pride themselves on any very fastidious taste. Some of the principals at Covent Garden were rather weak—the Alvise, the blind mother, and the Barnaba. This last (Giovanni Inghilleri) was a decent, workaday villain. An artist who could make the most of Barnaba's fiendishness would have given a different colour to the whole performance. Aureliano Pertile sang the tenor part, Enzo. This fine, robust singer could make more effect with his remarkable voice by varying the tone-quality of his high fortissimo. He is evidently very proud of the brazen ring he gets; and eminently effective it is at times. But he often uses that tone inappropriately. A pity he does not also cultivate a warmer, richer fortissimo. Madame Ponselle again gave the impression of thinking studiously about vocal production, even when in the thick of dramatic perils. And through her very thoughtfulness her production was not ideal.

Other performances were very much like those of last year. Miss Eva Turner, perhaps more assured than ever, repeated her success in 'Turandot.' Madame Pampanini was a pleasant, buxom little Mimi in 'Bohème' and sang admirably—apart from an excess of fortissimos. But then it was as reckless, rowdy a 'Bohème' as we had ever heard, and Bellezza's treatment was an invitation to all the singers to shout. 'Tosca,' on the other hand, was rather tame, with an insufficient singer as the heroine (Madame Carmen Melis). 'Boris Godounov,' again (which Mr. Coates conducted), was much what it had been the year before. Chaliapin was admirable beyond words. His performance was simply the acme of operatic art. Drama and music, song and sense, were here a unity. Possibly he was a less robust and subtler Boris than in years gone by. Anyhow, nothing finer could be imagined.

Mr. Goossens's 'Judith' was produced too late in the month for comment in this number. C.

'HIAWATHA'

'Hiawatha,' as opera-ballet-pageant, achieved even more than its usual success, and was generally held to be the best show in London during its fortnight's run. It scored heavily all round. The choral singing, despite the obvious difficulties of ensemble, &c., was better than that heard at many a good concert; the movement of the crowds could hardly have been smoother or more picturesque, the production showed not only skill but real imagination; and the small army of principals engaged for the run were on a good level. The ever-alert Dr. Malcolm Sargent performed a feat in obtaining a consistently good ensemble, though often he had his back to the orchestra, the choir widely dispersed before him, and the soloists well on the way to Hammersmith. The really brilliant success of this production indicates great possibilities. There must be a fair number of popular choral works that would lend themselves admirably to such dramatisation, and no better place could be found for it than the Albert Hall. 'Caractacus' suggests itself, and it is probable that 'Elijah' would be better suited to this treatment than to the operatic, which has been tried. Having mentioned opera, one naturally asks, 'Why not "Aida"?' The regulation which forbids stage plays at the Albert Hall is surely not inflexible. Anyway, 'Hiawatha' has opened up a field that promises pleasure to the public and profit to the Royal Choral Society and the Albert Hall. G.

SHADWELL'S 'THE ENCHANTED ISLE'

'With all his bulk, there 's nothing lost in Og,
For every inch that is not fool is rogue.'

This couplet of Dryden's, applied to the 'author' of 'The Enchanted Isle,' was obviously dictated by Dryden's disappointment in finding himself cashiered and Shadwell appointed to the Laureateship in his place. If Shadwell, who had the wit to employ Purcell for his arrangements of light opera, was a fool, what can we say of the modern purveyors of light musical entertainments? His adaptation of Shakespeare's 'Tempest' (in which he was helped by Dryden himself and Davenant) is negligible as literature. But Purcell's music survives, and its production at Haslemere by an admirable company of amateurs under the inspired guidance of Mr. Anthony Bernard was a very delightful experience. To approach it in the right way one must forget Shakespeare's 'Tempest'—a sacrifice not easily made. But here again the music helps by creating the right atmosphere, by taking the upper hand, by convincing the spectator that this Prospero's art and this Ariel's powers are not greater than Purcell's. It is not Prospero who proclaims that we are such stuff as dreams are made of; it is Purcell, who, giving life, light, and grace to the action, shows us our kinship with these creatures of fancy.

Excisions were inevitable in view of the unconscionable length of the play. But in this instance the blue pencil was in the hands of one who had the skill as well as the will to use it with discretion. Undoubtedly something was lost; but the action moved swiftly and there was no gaping hiatus, and the play seemed more logical than opera, lighter and more graceful than musical comedy, more fantastic than pantomime. Were Shadwell alive to-day, his genius for intrigue would secure for him a West-End theatre at Christmas; his genius for playing the impresario would bring about a revival of 'The Enchanted Isle' which would eclipse pantomimes and 'The Beggar's Opera.'

As for the performance, no praise can be too high for the spirit, skill, and intelligence of these admirable amateurs. Their task was not so difficult that the want of professional training could be a serious obstacle, while, on the other hand, their keenness and enthusiasm are very seldom found in professional ranks. Wisely, they placed a professional at the head of affairs—Mr. Anthony Bernard—and amongst the singers one claimed professional status. To these two the others probably owed a great debt, but so harmonious was the whole production that the spectator, while appreciating the points of each individual performance, was hardly aware of differences. If it was right that the 'Chief Devil' should possess a voice of magnificent resonance and the best technique, it was also appropriate that Ariel's singing should be child-like—most simple and most sweet. F. B.

Music in the Provinces

BIRMINGHAM.—At the end of May the Birmingham Grand Opera Society made history by giving a week's run of 'La Gioconda,' an opera which had never before been heard in the Midlands. The strength of the company was shown by several changes in the cast of principals; the production, by Mr. John Bierman, and the orchestral playing, under Mr. Appleby Matthews, were worthy of the occasion, and the singing of the chorus approached the 'grand' style. The well-known 'Dance of the Hours' was interpreted by a team from the Five Ways School of Dancing. The venture did great credit to the company, who were singularly unfortunate in the clashing of their date with the General Election.——The programmes of the Symphony Concerts to be given next season by the City Orchestra include Vaughan Williams's 'Pastoral' Symphony, Bliss's Introduction and Allegro, Bax's 'November Woods,' Delius's 'Brigg Fair,' and a Mahler programme that will include 'The Song of the Earth.'

BRISTOL.—A typical programme was given by the University Men's Choir at Colston Hall on June 1, under the direction of Mr. Arthur S. Warrell. It included Bantock's 'The Burden of Damascus'; a Benedicite for choir, orchestra, and organ, by Robin Milford; a setting of Scott's 'Gathering Song of Donald the Black,' by Mr. E. Smith, a Bristol organist; two works for baritone and tenor solos and men's choir, by Leslie Woodgate, entitled 'Hymn to the Virgin' and 'White Island'; William Wallace's 'The Outlaw'; Sibelius's 'The Song now Stilled'; Cyril Rootham's 'Jemima,' and many other enjoyable items.

CAMBRIDGE.—At the May Week concert of the C.U.M.S., under Dr. Cyril Rootham, the choir sang Purcell's 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day' and 'Soul of the World.' The Symphony was Beethoven's eighth. Mr. Bernhard Ord played the harpsichord part in de Falla's Concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, violin, and 'cello, and the programme concluded with Vaughan Williams's 'Five English Folk-Songs' for unaccompanied chorus.

CLECKHEATON.—The activities of the Cleckheaton Philharmonic Choral and Orchestral Society, which was founded about ninety years ago, have now come to an end.

HARROGATE.—Mr. Basil Cameron's first Symphony Concert of the season was held on May 23. The programme consisted of a Symphony in G major by Haydn, the 'Siegfried Idyll,' Saint-Saëns's A minor 'Cello Concerto, played by Mr. Norman Attwell, Haydn's 'L'Isola Disabitata' Overture, and Stanford's 'Songs of the Sea,' sung by Mr. Joseph Farrington. At the next concert Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Symphony, a tone-poem by Eric Milner, entitled 'In the Pine Forest,' and Grainger's 'Jutish Melody' were played.

HARTLEPOOL.—The Hartlepool Harmonic Society is to be disbanded owing to a lack of tenors and basses.

READING.—At a recital on May 13 a new work by Mr. W. Probert-Jones was performed for the first time, with Miss Marie Howes as soprano soloist. It is a setting of mediæval words entitled 'Rosa Mystica.' ——At the annual University concert, on June 4, the choir and orchestra, under Mr. W. K. Stanton, performed 'The Music-Makers' and Vaughan Williams's 'Toward the Unknown Region.' Miss Denne Parker was the contralto soloist.

SOUTHWOLD.—On June 6 the Southwold Harmonic and Choral Society, conducted by Miss Godwin-Foster, sang Bendall's 'The Lady of Shalott' and the conductor's own cantata, 'The Beggar Maid.'

Music in Wales

ABERYSTWYTH.—The College weekly concerts came to an end on May 16. The last few programmes included the Pianoforte Quintets of Franck and Schumann, Mozart's Sinfonia Concertante for violin and viola, two movements from Mozart's Bassoon Concerto, and 'The Revenge.'——On May 15 the Cardiganshire Festival took place in the University Hall. Nineteen children's choirs, accompanied by a children's orchestra, gave a morning programme of songs and part-songs. At the afternoon meeting a mixed-voice choir drawn from ten neighbouring towns and villages took part in a miscellaneous programme, concluding with the late Ambrose Lloyd's cantata, 'Habakkuk's Prayer.' The evening meeting was devoted to 'The Messiah.' As is customary at Welsh Festivals, hymns were sung by choir and audience. The conductors during the day were Mr. Matthews Williams and Mr. Bumford Griffiths.

BANGOR.—Arnold Bax's Quintet for harp and strings was played in the course of the orchestral concert which brought to an end the weekly series given under Mr. E. T. Davies at University College. This concert was the hundred and ninetieth since the series began. The recent season has comprised twenty-two of these weekly concerts (six being of a special nature), six lecture-concerts for children from the local schools, two choral concerts on a large scale, and two orchestral concerts. In addition, six concerts of great interest and value have been given under the auspices of the Musical Club. To all this music-making must be added a series of enjoyable organ recitals given by Mr. Leslie Paul and visiting organists on the beautiful organ (recently restored) at the Cathedral, as well as several highly creditable choral performances given by various local organizations in the district.——The Normal College Choir, under Miss Ceridwen Lloyd, gave its annual concert on June 4, when the programme consisted of 'The Revenge,' Elgar's 'Bavarian Dances,' and Schubert's 'Song of Miriam.' Miss Elsie Suddaby was the soloist.

CARDIFF.—On May 23 the National Orchestra of Wales, conducted by Mr. Warwick Braithwaite, gave the last Thursday Subscription Symphony concert of the season, Mozart's G minor and Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphonies and Glazounov's 'Rhapsodie Orientale' being the principal works; and on the Saturday following the City Hall Popular Concerts ended with a Wagner programme. By next March this orchestra will have been financed by the B.B.C. for two years. It is now desired to place it on a more permanent basis, and accordingly a special programme was given at the City Hall on June 7, when an appeal for support was made by Dr. Ben Davies. A national orchestra for Wales has been an aspiration of many years' standing, and after much work and negotiation by Sir Walford Davies and others (on behalf of the National Council of Music), the Lord Mayor and civic authorities of Cardiff, the Trustees of the National Museum of Wales, and the B.B.C. authorities, a scheme of subscription concerts (symphony and popular) in the City Hall, and of free concerts in the National Museum, was launched with the newly-organized National Orchestra of Wales. Although the orchestra is located at Cardiff, it is intended to make it increasingly available for general purposes in the Principality, including that of ministering to the mental needs of the distressed areas. It is realised that its disbandment now would be a great loss to the national culture, and it is much hoped that adequate support will be forthcoming.

NEWTOWN.—The ninth annual Montgomeryshire Musical Festival took place on May 23, when twenty-one choirs from small towns and villages in the central part of the county united with an orchestra consisting of local players and members of the Welsh Symphony and Birmingham City Orchestras to give miscellaneous programmes in the afternoon and first half of the evening session, and the 'Hymn of Praise' as the concluding work. Features of the afternoon session were 'Spring,' from Haydn's 'Seasons,' Elgar's 'It comes from the misty ages' and 'The Dance,' as choral items with orchestra. Weber's 'Oberon' Overture, Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony, and the Adagio from Mozart's Clarinet Concerto (soloist, Mr. Robert Baulkes) were the orchestral items. Miss Dora Labbette, Mr. Parry Jones, and Mr. Watcyn Watcyns were the singers. Following a much appreciated custom of recent years, a chamber-music item was given, this year's selection being the Andante and Rondo from Beethoven's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat, Op. 16. The conductors during the day were Dr. Adrian Boult and Mr. W. R. Allen.

Music in Scotland

BALLATER.—A new opera, 'The Forge,' by Ian Whyte, one of the younger Scottish composers, was staged by the Ballater Choral Union. The composer, who is organist to Lord Glentanar at Aboyne Castle, conducted; the members of the Edinburgh String Quartet assisted.

EDINBURGH.—The gala week of opera given by the Edinburgh Opera Company at the Empire Theatre presented some novel features. Two performances of Puccini's 'La Bohème' and one of Leoncavallo's 'I Pagliacci' were given, with Mr. Joseph Hislop, who is a native of Edinburgh, as principal tenor and Mr. John Barbirolli as conductor. Four performances were given of Prof. Donald Francis Tovey's new opera, 'The Bride of Dionysus,' two of these conducted by the composer and two by Mr. David Stephen. One performance of Gluck's 'Orpheus,' conducted by Mr. Stephen, completed the scheme. The veteran Mr. E. C. Hedmondt acted as producer. A critical account of the Tovey opera having appeared in last month's Musical Times, further reference to it is unnecessary, but a personal point of interest was the reappearance of Mr. Francis Harford, the old-time Covent Garden basso, certainly with diminished vocal powers but with all his old histrionic grip and aplomb. The week's performances were, as a whole, of good quality—least so in the Tovey opera, which made heavy demands on principals, chorus, and orchestra alike. In the Italian operas, Mr. Hislop was of course in great form, but despite Covent Garden tradition, it seemed a mistake to have him sing in Italian while the others sang in English, and more than a mistake to have him sing 'Vesta la giubba' in Italian and proceed to repeat it as an encore in English!——At the fourth meeting of the Edinburgh Bach Society, chorales and a secular chorus by Bach and a number of Elizabethan madrigals and motets were sung by a small choir, and some Bach songs from the 'Schemelli Gesangbuch,' English songs from the Lutenists, and a group of 'Songs of the Virgin Mary,' by Wolf, Cornelius, Reger, and Brahms, were sung by Miss Mona Benson.——In connection with the great Church Assemblies held annually at Edinburgh in May, the Edinburgh Royal Choral Union and the Edinburgh Amateur Orchestral Society joined forces in a Sunday evening performance of 'The Messiah,' in Usher Hall.——The Reid Symphony Orchestra (Prof. Tovey) gave a command performance before the Duke and Duchess of York at Holyrood Palace. The programme included Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony and Mozart's 'Magic Flute' Overture.——The Scottish Chamber Music Players (Misses Mary Grierson, pianoforte, Gladys Clark, violin, Maud Cowan, viola, and Ruth Waddell, 'cello) announced a second season of three recitals. At the first of these, Schubert's infrequently heard Trio in one movement for violin, viola, and 'cello, and sonatas for pianoforte and violin by Beethoven, No. 5 in F, and Brahms, in A major, were played. At the second, the programme comprised Brahms's Pianoforte Trio in C minor, Op. 101, Mozart's Pianoforte Quartet in G minor, K.478, and Bax's exacting E major Pianoforte Quartet in one movement.

GLASGOW.—At the annual general meeting of the Glasgow Choral and Orchestral Union (Scottish Orchestra), the chairman stated that a loss of £1,117 had been incurred on the season's concerts, the deficit being approximately of the same amount as the previous year's. A call of 3*s*. 9*d*. per £ would be made on the guarantors, as compared with 6*s*. per £ in the previous year, the reduction being due to a substantial increase in the guarantee fund as the result of intensive propaganda. The prospects for next season could not be regarded as bright. Aberdeen and Dunfermline were dropping their Scottish Orchestra concerts, and the revenue from broadcasting was likely to be less. It was announced that for next season the conductors would be Mr. Van Raalte, conductor of the State Opera at The Hague, Mr. Robert Heger, conductor of the State Opera at Vienna, and Mr. Golschmann, from Paris. Mr. Van Raalte, who made so remarkably favourable an impression last season, and Mr. Heger, a newcomer, will be welcome. But the re-engagement of Mr. Golschmann for a third successive season we can only regard as either freakishness or obstinacy on the part of the committee, in view of the large amount of adverse opinion of his work entertained and expressed in well-informed quarters.——The Saturday evening concerts organized by the Abstainers' Union are to be discontinued owing to lack of public support, the past season having shown a deficit of £490. The concerts of the Glasgow Abstainers' Union have been carried on for seventy-five years, and brought many favourite performers to Glasgow.——The Halls Committee of Glasgow Corporation announces its intention of promoting a series of concerts on Saturday evenings in October to take the place of the Abstainers' Union concerts. Other Corporation concerts for next season include the usual City Hall Saturday evening concerts and Saturday afternoon recitals in St. Andrew's Hall and the City Hall.——Glasgow Corporation Tramways Orchestra, at its annual concert, given in the Lyric Theatre, presented a programme of light and tuneful music.——Mr. Erik Chisholm gave in St. Matthew's U.F. Church what was announced as the first complete performance in Great Britain of Karg-Elert's Sixty-six Choral Improvisations for organ, Op. 65. Before each number the chorale on which it is built was played in a harmonization by Bach, and the verse of the hymn was read which had supplied the composer with his theme for expression. This notable enterprise occupied three evenings, and attracted a much smaller audience than it deserved.——Mr. A. M. Henderson, who has resigned his appointment as organist and choirmaster at Westbourne Church, Glasgow, presumably to devote himself more fully to his duties as organist of Glasgow University, gave two farewell organ recitals in Westbourne Church, and was assisted by the a cappella choir of the church.

GENERAL.—The death of Mr. Max Mossel will be received in Scotland with feelings of profound regret. His earliest association with Scotland was in 1892, when he became one of the first violins of the newly-formed Scottish Orchestra, under Henschel. His annual series of concerts, started in 1919 and carried on throughout at remarkably low subscription rates, had won through the calibre of its artists and the quality of its music a distinctive place in Scottish musical life, and Mr. Mossel's engaging personality had made for him a host of personal friends.

THE FIRST SUMMER FESTIVAL IN BERLIN

By HILDA ANDREWS

However worried the Berliners may have been about the prospects of their first summer Festival, the results must surely have set their minds at rest (I write before the finish). The special season has only ten days more to run, and for the last four weeks it has been one long succession of packed and enthusiastic houses. Moreover, the first week at least was a purely domestic affair before the annual rush of Americans, and the response to the opening performances must have satisfied the promoters that the average German, in spite of all the critics' jeremiads about wireless and sport and similar counter-attractions, is still a music-lover. Taste is changing, but the musical habit of mind inculcated for generations dies hard, and even if modern Germany seems to prefer Verdi to Wagner, and Puccini to Strauss, one feels that the change is merely a phase. We cannot so summarily write off the nation which Toscanini only a week or two ago called a race of 'musical Titans.' And we English are apt to forget that Wagner is staler to Germans than to us; the 'Ring' is still fairly new to many of us. But it is possible for the interminable battering of the 'Nibelung' forge to pall after countless re-hearing, and that without involving one in a fall from musical grace.

However, degenerate or no, Germany is certainly under the influence of an international—not only Italian—reaction, and the Festival season reflects admirably the mood of the moment. As a matter of fact, the whole six-weeks' programme is a triumph of good taste, and taking it as a whole a better could hardly be imagined, always remembering that a little national bias is natural. The promoters of the Festival have reinforced the 'nationalist' party; for while the visit of Toscanini with the Scala company en bloc was undeniably the great draw, the keen interest shown in the new setting of the 'Ring,' Strauss's six operas, and a general survey of the German répertoire, proves that there are still thousands in and around Berlin who have the cause of purely German music at heart, and find their Wagner improves with keeping.

'Der Berliner Festspiele, 1929,' has covered an enormous field. Between May 19 and June 23 more than forty-eight performances have been fitted in. Not only German and Italian opera, at Berlin's three opera houses, but concerts, special productions in the theatre—Shakespeare produced by Barnowsky, the Diaghilev ballet conducted by Ansermet, cinema, and even special broadcast nights. Glancing down the programme one's first thought is the significance of its artistic scope. Surely such close association between music and drama must engender a sympathy! Where both are so vital, new ideas must result. Production, at least, on the operatic stage in Germany, is so flawless that new fields have opened up. Reinhardt and Jessner in the Berlin theatre have their counterpart in Holy and Hörth in the opera. Last year twelve million marks was spent on the stage machinery at the State Opera in Unter den Linden, and its 'Hinterscenen' is now one of the wonders of Europe. In the face of facts like these one cannot doubt the passionate vitality of Germany's artistic life. Music may not be, cannot be, a national monopoly, but for the last hundred or so years Germany has made more of a habit of it than any other nation in Europe, and it is futile to deny its artistic results. After all, Frederick the Great used to keep the Berlin State Opera going out of his private purse, and in his day seats were free. Berlin has an operatic tradition to keep up, and while seats are now very far from being free, the opera is still there for those who want to hear it. We had the same tradition in England in the days of Arne and Dibdin, but it has lapsed for so long that re-establishment is a slow and painful process.

The original idea was to begin and end the Festival with 'The Mastersingers,' but another work has been chosen for the final night. The opening on Whit-Sunday was a magnificent performance under Kleiber at the Unter den Linden Opera, and the 'Ring,' on June 2, 3, 5, and 7, under Leo Blech, at the same opera; 'The Flying Dutchman' on June 12, under Klemperer at the Kroll-Opera; and 'Tristan' on June 18 under Furtwängler, at Charlottenburg, have followed since. Hörth was producing the 'Ring' with an entirely new setting by Emil Pirchan, such a setting as Wagner in his wildest dreams could never have thought possible—a really colossal piece of realism, full of harmony of colour and line. One may question the usefulness of going on attempting realistic settings of the 'Ring,' but no one could question the beauty of conception and execution of this one. It is the best possible until some great stage artist creates a purely symbolical and simple setting, which might prove the most satisfactory to a modern audience. For voices, we heard very much the same as we have had at Covent Garden—Frida Leider, Fritz Soot, Schorr, and so on; and apart from magnificence of production, there was little to choose between the performances there and here. Blech is steadier at the helm than Walter, but less dynamic. Maria Müller is a charming singer with an exquisite voice, heard as Gutrune in the 'Ring,' and the most perfect Eva it could ever be one's lot to see or hear. A young Swedish tenor is singing in Berlin just now, Carl Martin Oehmann, giving us a fine Walter to her Eva, and Leo Schützendorf is a magnificent and versatile baritone we have not so far heard in England, singing rôles as varied as Alberich, Figaro, and Wozzeck in Alban Berg's new opera of that name.

The Strauss cycle has come later in the Festival season, the 'Rosenkavalier,' 'Salome,' 'Intermezzo,' 'Elektra,' 'Die Frau ohne Schatten,' and 'Die Ægyptische Helena,' brilliant evenings, all conducted by the composer himself. Mozart is represented by 'Figaro' and the 'Seraglio,' and a concert performance of 'Titus,' under the baton of Kleiber, on June 22. 'Figaro' on May 25 was the most delicate piece of irresponsibility imaginable, conducted by Blech. Furtwängler conducts a second performance on June 13. The rest of the German répertoire is modern, and Franz Schreker's 'Der Ferne Klang,' 'Der Schatzgräber,' and 'Der Singende Teufel' were given during the second week of the Festival, Alban Berg's 'Wozzeck' on May 23, and a new work by Hindemith, 'Neues vom Tage,' was heard for the first time on June 9, having been previously billed for the 2nd. Eugèn d'Albert's 'Schwarzer Orchidee' is to be given on the 10th at Charlottenburg.

Berg's 'Wozzeck' is full of dramatic and musical interest. Here we have a work in which the three functions of opera are equally adjusted to each other, exactly and perilously poised, a piece essentially dramatic yet dependent upon both orchestra and production not only for success but for any effect at all. This play of Georg Büchner's—the tale of a private soldier of the 'sixties, neurotic dreamer of dreams and visions, driven at last to jealous murder and suicide—is given in fifteen scenes, superbly mounted, a stiff proposition for the producer, and stiffer still for the voices. In the name-part Leo Schützendorf was vocally and spiritually equal to the occasion, and his enunciation is perfect. Berg's style in vocal writing is more than half parlando, written with fine lucidity, and though he belongs categorically to the Schönberg school, he is none the less an individualist. 'Wozzeck' is scored for a full-strength orchestra, but so economically—he is fond, too, of solo strings—that by weaving a fine thin web of contrapuntal sound the composer is able to achieve an astounding climax when he needs it without straining or forcing out mere noise. The work is fascinatingly wrought, with free use of old forms like fugue in passages of real and new beauty. Both from the orchestra pit and from the stage is given us a subtle psycho-analytical study, appealing perhaps more to the intellect than to the heart, but none the less interesting for that.

The Schreker operas are banal, verbose, watered-down Wagner, with more than a dash of the Italian school of the 'nineties. Yet Schreker seems to have a good following among Berlin opera-goers, and all three were enthusiastically received—more so than 'Wozzeck,' which some timid soul even ventured to hiss.

Hindemith's new work must have been brilliant. According to Einstein it is apparently a misnomer as 'Neues vom Tage,' as it seems to be a typical light comedy of the 'Così fan Tutte' variety à la moderne, incorporating not merely a bedroom but a bathroom scene in which the lady was observed to be, as Einstein goes on to say, 'in puris naturalibus,' the whole richly decorated in Hindemith's best and most sparkling style, not quite classical jazz but with more than a hint of it. One wonders that Hans Pfitzner was not better represented in the Festspiele programme; one writer complained ironically that this famous modernist was doing no more than conduct a wireless concert of his own works. If these are of the same class as his 'Palestrina' one can forgive his exclusion.

The Toscanini visit was, of course, the real thrill for the Berliners. The entire La Scala company came from Milan, and gave six performances during the first fortnight—Verdi's 'Falstaff,' 'Rigoletto,' 'Trovatore,' 'Aida,' Puccini's 'Manon Lescaut,' and Donizetti's 'Lucia di Lammermoor.' The production, let it be at once admitted, was disappointing, and it is irritating to find experienced singers, singing in old operatic warhorses that they must know backwards, still looking round continually for the beat—even of a Toscanini. One knows it to be an Italian mannerism, but it jars. For the musician the interest lay in hearing Toscanini clear up the scores of these old Verdi works and galvanise them into life again. They are, as it were, strained through the fine filter of his extraordinary musicianship, and emerge with a new and totally unexpected clarity. The mere sight of his baton quivering like a whiplash above the orchestra is galvanic, his pace is always on the fast side, and yet we hear more of Verdi's finer points in the score than ever we realised were there to be heard. Stabile sang Falstaff finely, but his dramatic conception of the part is, I suppose, Italian; at all events it leaves the richness of one of our minor national heroes rather to the imagination, and shows us only an unattractive sot. But the inimitable sparkle of Italian women provided us with wit and good singing enough in Signore Llopart, Alfani, Casazza, and Vasari, as Mistress Ford and her companions in farce. Toscanini had an ovation that was almost an international event, and Berlin willingly paid doubled and trebled prices to hear him. He returns in the autumn with the Metropolitan Opera orchestra for a series of concerts.

There have been, on May 28 and June 8, 'stunt' performances in the Rococo Theatre at Potsdam, when Kleiber conducted Donizetti's 'Don Pasquale,' and in the Golden Gallery at the Castle of Charlottenburg on June 5 and 12, when the élite of Berlin society foregathered to listen to flute concertos of Frederick the Great, Mozart, and Haydn, and a new song-cycle by Richard Strauss. Among other concerts were two Beethoven evenings under Furtwängler, the B minor Mass and Mahler's 'Lied von der Erde,' by the Berlin Philharmonic, under Bruno Walter, the only time he has held the baton. Berlin is missing him sadly, and the performances at Charlottenburg since he left are definitely inferior.

The Diaghilev ballet under Ansermet was announced to give four performances on June 18-21, including 'The Cat,' 'Les Fâcheux,' 'Prince Igor,' 'Le Pas d'Acier,' Stravinsky's 'Rossignol,' and a new Prokofiev. The Festival concludes on June 23 with Busoni's 'Dr. Faust,' under Kleiber, at the Unter den Linden Opera.

BERLIN

This year, for the first time in the history of Berlin musical life, a summer season of opera and concerts is being attempted. The chief events of this season will be treated after its close at the end of June. For the present report some outstanding events of the regular season still call for notice.

The famous Amsterdam Concertgebouw orchestra, conducted by Willem Mengelberg, has given two concerts at Berlin with extraordinary success. The sterling qualities of this orchestra, its power, brilliancy, flexibility, and virtuosity, its noble tone, make it superior to nearly all of the best European orchestras. Its master and educator, Mengelberg, plays on this well-nigh perfect instrument with a supreme mastery, and thus marvellous and quite unique effects are reached. Never, for instance, has the thunderstorm in Beethoven's 'Pastoral' Symphony been heard in a similarly realistic style and with such elementary power; and who believed that Liszt's rather played-out and faded 'Les Préludes' could be made to sound so strikingly brilliant, powerful, and interesting? With Tchaikovsky's fifth and Mahler's fourth Symphony, Mengelberg was particularly successful.

For the second programme Vladimir Horowitz was soloist, playing Rachmaninov's Concerto No. 3, in D minor, with an admirable and extremely brilliant virtuosity, even surpassing the composer himself, who had played the same Concerto here a few months ago.

Ossip Gabrilowitch, who is distinguished not only as a pianist but as the conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, appeared four times in his two capacities. As pianist he excelled in Brahms's B flat Concerto, which he played at a Furtwängler concert, and in a Mozart two-pianoforte Concerto, which he performed in conjunction with Bruno Walter. As a conductor he firmly established himself as a favourite of the Berlin public. His concerts were truly a musical invasion from America.

Still more exciting and sensational (in the better sense) was the impression made by the twelve-year-old violinist, Yehndi Menuhin, the descendant of a Russo-Jewish family formerly resident in Palestine and now in America. The achievements of this boy betoken rare genius. At a concert conducted by Bruno Walter he played Concertos of Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms with a captivating beauty and purity of sound, and faultless technical virtuosity. His playing of Mozart at his second concert can only be described as unsurpassable. Fritz Busch, the famous Director of the Dresden Opera, wrote an article in one of the leading Berlin daily papers before the first concert, publicly confessing his faith in this gifted child, whose playing he had previously experienced when conducting a concert at New York.

The Dayton Westminster Choir, from Ohio, is the first institution of exclusively native growth that America has sent to Germany. Its conductor, Dr. J. F. Williamson, an excellent choral trainer, has succeeded in forming an a cappella mixed chorus of quite exceptional qualities as regards beauty of vocal material, purity and precision, and virtuosity of ensemble. In spite of the Choir's fine technical equipment, its two concerts were somewhat disappointing, owing to a strange choice of programme in which a somewhat antiquated and characteristically American taste was manifest—a naïve delight in smooth, polished, sweet sound, in sentimental melody, in imitation of orchestral effects, with ample use of humming voices and similar popular devices.

A number of British artists have been here, chief among them being the English Singers, who now enjoy an international reputation and are always welcome at Berlin, where their ensemble singing, their culture and good taste, and their delightful programmes of part-songs, madrigals, and motets are fully appreciated.

Ethel Bartlett and Rae Robertson displayed the unusual excellence to which they have attained as duettists on two pianofortes, doing justice alike to the musical, spiritual, and emotional demands of the compositions performed.

William Busch, a young English musician, manifested considerable pianistic skill at his recital. He played pieces by Bax and John Ireland—of the latter the enjoyable and well-written Sonatina which was heard at the International Festival at Geneva. His own set of Variations and a Fugue showed Mr. Busch to be a well-taught and cultivated composer of reasonably modern tendencies.

The Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestra was heard at Berlin for the first time. The remarkable qualities of the orchestra are in great part due to its leader, Dr. Karl Muck. This eminent artist, now seventy years of age, shows in his conducting high artistic wisdom, complete penetration, and a directness and simplicity that are remarkable in their effects. His Beethoven interpretation must be counted among the most powerful impressions of the entire season.

Wolf-Ferrari's new opera 'Sly' (after 'The Taming of the Shrew') was given for the first time at Berlin in the Municipal Opera House with fair success, a short time after the German première at Dresden. Wolf-Ferrari, one of the most experienced and skilful opera composers of our age, has given us in 'Sly' a product of experience and skill, rather than of inventive genius. As regards freshness and attractiveness, characteristic power of melodic material, his older operas are decidedly superior to 'Sly.' But the new opera is stronger in dramatic effect, and more modern in style. The librettist, Forzano, has treated his theme with skill, but neither he nor the composer has succeeded in making 'Sly' really alive, or in awakening a profound human sympathy in the listener. The impression of well-made 'theatre' is never absent; poetry and musical art, in a higher sense, hardly make themselves felt, save in a few places here and there, especially in the great duet of the second Act, a really effective and valuable number. Robert Denzler conducted. Among the singers, Joseph Burgwinkel excelled as Sly; his partner, Mafalda Salvatini, hardly matched him in vocal and dramatic power.

Since the production of 'Wozzeck' at Berlin several years ago, Alban Berg has not been a prolific composer. In default of a new work by Berg, at Kleiber's last symphony concert with the Berlin State Orchestra recourse was had to an early work of his that had not been heard at Berlin. This was a set of songs, well sung by Claire Born, of Vienna. The music is far distant from 'Wozzeck,' finding its place rather in the region of Richard Strauss. It is well written for the voice, and its orchestral colouring is arresting. The programme included Schumann's 'Rhenish' Symphony. After being belittled for many years, Schumann's Symphonies are being revived again by our best conductors, and are coming into fashion.

All musical centres in Germany did honour to Hans Pfitzner on his sixtieth birthday, May 5. At Munich an entire week was devoted to his dramatic, symphonic, and choral works, his chamber music, and his songs.

Kœnigsberg, in East Prussia, where Hermann Scherchen is Musical Director, generously celebrated the composer, but Berlin, Leipsic, Dresden, Frankfort, and Cologne have been much more reserved in their expressions of esteem. This difference of attention has something to do with politics, as Pfitzner is playing a conspicuous part in the extreme German Nationalist party.

HOLLAND

THE CENTENARY OF 'TOONKUNST'

Circumstances made the observance of the centenary of the birth of the Nederlandsch Maatschappij tot Bevordering der Toonkunst (the Netherlands Society for the Promotion of Music) a little late, but this was more than atoned for by the thoroughness with which the celebrations were carried out. The concert and meeting which I mentioned briefly in last month's Musical Times formed the festival of The Hague section alone, and those of the Society generally took place at Amsterdam from June 5 to 9. In view of the happy relations which have existed between the Society and many foreign bodies an effort was made to bring in as wide a representation as possible, and invitations were issued to individuals and societies in various countries. Among those who accepted such invitations were Prof. Dent and Mr. Gerald Cooper, the latter representing the Royal Philharmonic Society, Prof. Guido Adler from Vienna, M. Humblat from Paris, Prof. Leo Kestenburg from Berlin, Sr. Ottorino Respighi, and M. Joseph Jongen. Mr. Rubin Goldmark, who had hoped to represent America, was prevented from attending owing to illness. All of these were elected honorary members of the Society, while official distinctions and orders of knighthood were bestowed by the Dutch Queen on the officers of the Society.

Not unnaturally the principal musical items were those in which the Amsterdam chorus, which was the original nucleus of the Society, and the Concertgebouw Orchestra had achieved their greatest success. At the first concert Willem Mengelberg's 'Wilhelmus' Prelude, really a somewhat elaborate arrangement of the Dutch national anthem, opened and was followed by Diepenbrock's Te Deum and Beethoven's ninth Symphony. A still bigger event was the third concert, in which Mahler's eighth Symphony, the 'Symphony of a Thousand,' filled the bill. For this the assistance of a choir of boys from the Society for the Improvement of Popular Singing (Vereeniging tot Verbetering van den Volkszang), and an octet of soloists (not all of whom were Dutch by nationality), was requisitioned. With Mengelberg conducting and these forces at his command there is no need to describe the performances, which reached as near perfection as can be desired.

How such excellence has been attained, and how the general work, both purely musical and educational, has been developed, we were shown not only by means of a large number of speeches and by an excellent history of the Society written by J. D. C. van Dokkum, an enthusiastic historian of Dutch musical life, but also by means of a small but effective collection of portraits and documents exhibited in one of the rooms of the Municipal Museum. The idea and the first activities of 'Toonkunst' were the work of A. C. G. Vermeulen, who was director of a Secondary School at Rotterdam and a keen amateur musician. He was followed by J. P. Heye, who also did much to inculcate a love of pure melody among the working people of Holland, and by Daniel de Lange, whose work for musical art and education in the country was immeasurable.

The music schools at Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and Utrecht have all been established under the ægis of the Society, as have choral bodies in no less than twenty-five towns in various parts of the country. Although, owing to the 'businesslike' methods of some former officials who cleared up more frequently than is now considered desirable, the archives of the Society are not as rich as might be hoped, the study of musical history has been encouraged by the help that was given in the foundation of the Netherlands Association for Musical History. Something has also been done for Dutch composers, and although it was a long time before anything that could be called more than an imitation of German classicism was evoked, the competitions and awards resulted in considerable efforts which led eventually to the work of such modern writers as Pijper, Voormolen, Sigtenhorst Meyer, and Dopper. One work, Diepenbrock's Te Deum, written for a festival in 1902, is itself a complete justification of whatever energy has been spent on behalf of the native composer. For the rest, for the way in which it has encouraged folk-song, musical criticism, and many other branches of the art one has no space to spare. Suffice to say that the history of this Society and of its daughter societies is the history of a remarkable rise in the musicality of a small but not unimportant nation.

HERBERT ANTCLIFFE.

ITALY

The last evening of the Scala opera was dedicated to Verdi, the composer whose 'Otello' opened the season last autumn. There are yet no signs of an abatement of the Verdi wave in Italy, and the great enthusiasm evidenced for him abroad is a phenomenon well worth studying. It can scarcely be denied that it is a phenomenon in Germany, and a moment's thought will reveal a more complicated question than at first is apparent. To say that it is a matter of the psychology of the moment is insufficient. We are all aware that it has been generally accepted that where Wagner called for intellectual listening and perhaps greater detachment, Verdi was obvious and made a more direct challenge to the emotions. If this were true once, it is so no longer. Granted that the Wagner score is still the wonder of the musician, the day is past when the general musical public is unable to understand and enjoy him as an operatic and musical experience. Your opera-goer takes his Wagner and Debussy as his grandfather took his Auber and Donizetti. The advantage is with us in that we have all of them. For which reason it seems too superficial to put this extraordinary revival down to reaction and post-war ennui, &c. It is not enough.

'TWELFTH NIGHT'

The only reason one could have for dealing at length with this opera, which had its première at the Filodramatici here last month, would be to dissuade young composers from the practice of taking Shakespeare, for obvious reasons, and, matching his comedies with a few suitable tone-colours, trying to spring into fame overnight. They should remember that Verdi had had about sixty years' experience when he composed 'Falstaff,' and that he was a genius.

This was the first opera by Guido Farina, a young Milanese who should, judging by 'Twelfth Night,' go a long way indeed. He employed practically all of the best-known methods in one form or another, and showed very real gifts for orchestration. Some of his music was strangely akin to some of the best of Strauss, which is saying much. His treatment of the songs was splendid, and quite the best feature of the entire opera, which, by the way, lacked mostly continuity and conclusiveness. It will most certainly never become famous, but the promise shown and the undoubted charm of certain pages indicate exceptional talent.

Umberto Mugnai rehearsed and directed the opera. The Malvolio and Sir Toby were amusingly good. Since the Milan première the opera has been given several times in the provinces. The performance here was the last of the Filodramatici season.

END OF THE ROME AND NAPLES SEASONS

Before the San Carlo opera finished they gave their final novelty of the season in the shape of Felice Lattuada's 'Don Giovanni.' Lattuada is also Milanese, but of a generation prior to Farina. He is already well known both as an opera composer and as a chamber musician. The offence of re-setting this old book was not so heinous as appeared at first sight, since the drama remains the same only in certain respects. It stresses rather the heavier side, and for that reason surprised people. Its reception did not lack enthusiasm, which at Naples means that there must be a certain amount of vitality in the work, but this does not in the least guarantee its quality. The interpretation was entrusted to several of La Scala artists, under the direction of M°. Salfi.

There were also several extra-special performances of 'L'Elisir d'amore,' with the celebrated tenor, Tito Schipa. The applause was riotous after the famous 'Una furtiva lagrima,' but though it lasted a quarter of an hour the inflexible rule of 'no encores' was observed. It should be noted that the edition of the opera as it is known to lovers of the Marionettes is considerably shortened.

OPEN-AIR OPERA

The suddenness with which summer has come has not apparently checked the ardour of the impresarios, who have already inaugurated the out-of-door performances. So far as Milan is concerned with the Parco Scarlatti, there is no need to discuss the events. They are only mentioned as being a glaring example of the gullibility of singers. For the most part the principals are foreign debutants paying substantial sums for the doubtful privilege of singing their favourite rôles. This is one of the most noxious forms of the parasitical activities of the theatrical people in Italy. It is of course patent that the singer must treat his business like any other, and to become known he must make some sacrifices. Preying on the weaknesses of the class, there are numberless so-called agencies whose sole scope is the exploitation of the student's desire to make his debut. These agents, as a rule, have special periodicals devoted to their nefarious seasons, which no one dreams of reading, and which are only taken at exorbitant prices by the individuals, foreigners of course, who do not for the most part even know enough Italian to read the daily papers. In the belief that their advertisements will be seen by the important impresarios—who have a hundred fine voices for each single job—they are induced to still further fritter away their means. So much for the Parco Scarlatti. English students considering visiting Italy for study purposes will do well to remember the name. CHARLES D'IF.

VIENNA

LA SCALA COMPANY AT VIENNA

With only the wealthiest class able to afford the high admission prices of what by its very name poses as a national opera, a majority of the Austrian populace feel frequently inclined to ask the question: 'Why State Opera?' For the summer months at least the authorities frankly abandon the formula, and openly surrender the Staatsoper to the foreign tourists—this year more than ever before, when the 'Vienna Festival Weeks' are propagated by the 'Commission for the Promotion of Tourism in Austria.'

The long-anticipated visit of La Scala company from Milan, which preceded the Festival Weeks proper, was admittedly an enterprise for the socially and financially elect natives and for the more numerous tourists. The high admission prices were quite obviously necessitated by the enormous outlay entailed in the transportation to Vienna of an entire company of singers, orchestral players, choristers, and technical helpers—some four hundred persons in all, headed by their master, Arturo Toscanini—and accompanied by the complete scenery for the performances. It was a unique event equal to, if not surpassing in its proportions, last year's pilgrimage of the Vienna State Opera to Paris. Local patriots found cause for rejoicing in the fact that the Vienna visit of La Scala preceded that of the same company to Berlin—an important point in Vienna's favour in that eternal though amiable battle for supremacy waged between the two cities.

Two operas were given—'Falstaff' and 'Lucia di Lammermoor,' both presented with the perfection of musical detail and with that impeccable ensemble spirit inseparably associated with the name of Toscanini, and acquired by means of an arduous and expensive rehearsal work which no other theatre but La Scala can afford, and incidentally no other musician but Toscanini has the authority to enforce. It was by such qualities alone that La Scala proved its superiority to Vienna's own Opera. The individual voices of the singers—Pertile, dal Monte, Stabile, for instance—were never superior, and often inferior, to what Viennese artists like Lotte Lehmann, Schumann, Alfred Piccaver, Richard Mayr, and others are able to give; the chorus was equal to our own bodies, the orchestra decidedly inferior in tone-quality, and the scenic settings, though costly and tasteful, avowedly old-fashioned and unoriginal. As conductor and spiritual master of the entire apparatus, Toscanini was, as always, incomparable. It is he, and perhaps he alone, who constitutes La Scala's greatness.

ERICH W. KORNGOLD REDIVIVUS

The Staatsoper recently celebrated a rare sort of 'jubilee,' the fiftieth performance of Erich Korngold's opera, 'Die tote Stadt' within the approximately eight years that separate us from the première of the work. A notable record for a contemporary opera, and particularly notable since other and many more important and interesting pieces have fallen by the wayside within the same space of time. A portion of the popularity commanded by 'Die tote Stadt' undoubtedly falls to the credit of Marie Jeritza, who created, and this time again sang, the rôle of Marie. Few other parts allow Madame Jeritza to be so completely herself, with all her great talents and still greater mannerisms. Her portrayal of the heroine, crudely 'stagey,' is perhaps as appropriate to the theatricalism of Korngold's opera as it is opposed to the spirit of Rosenbach's novel on which the opera is based.

The present writer admits the effectiveness of much of Korngold's piece, but does not count 'Die tote Stadt' among the young composer's happiest products. I for one give the preference over this opera, as well as over the equally theatrical 'Violanta,' to the latter's sister opera, 'The Ring of Polykrates,' which the Vienna Opera has only recently revived. It is Korngold's first and by no means most successful opera, but surely his best and healthiest one. A charming little rococo piece, delightfully and transparently scored, and so excellently written that it is no less fresh to-day than it was thirteen years ago, when our ears were less sharpened by the spice and brilliance of present-day improved and enlarged orchestral possibilities. Free from pathos and sentimentalism, it is the sort of opera to expect from an immensely gifted youth of sixteen, which Korngold was at the time of its composition.

Almost simultaneously with the revival of 'Polykrates' we heard the new, posthumous operetta of Leo Fall, entitled 'Roses from Florida,' at the Theater an der Wien. This piece, though it sails under Fall's flag, is indeed the work of Korngold, who completed it from Fall's sketches, providing for Fall's music both the harmonies and the orchestration. Going beyond Fall, Korngold has added a welcome and discriminately applied element of jazz music, particularly so in the Interlude that precedes the third Act. Korngold conducted it with visible enjoyment of the syncopated fun, and thus justified a prediction which your correspondent has ventured in these columns years ago that an eventual and inevitable association of the young composer with Viennese operetta will benefit both parties some early day.

The book of Korngold's—or Fall's—new piece is not much less sentimental in plot; but Korngold has at last mustered the courage to abandon some of the intolerable grand opera pathos now current in operetta, and to discard the inevitable operatic 'grand finale' of Act 2. For a musician of Korngold's talent it ought to be easy to go one step farther by leading operetta out of the thicket of pseudo-operatic aspiration and back to its origin, a thing totally opposed to the sham logics of grand opera and conceived in the burlesque style of present-day American operetta. For the present, the 'Americanisation' of our comic operas is limited to the fact that American millionaires and heiresses populate the plots. The new form of operetta—and Korngold is perhaps the man to achieve it—is the 'American' type plus a touch of the literary and spiritual such as a modern musician of Korngold's status has at his command.

VIENNESE OPERETTA

Viennese operetta indeed wants new blood and new incentives. Franz Lehar, the spiritual father of contemporary Viennese operetta in its by now traditional and petrified form, persists in an ill-applied ambition of bringing the species close to grand opera. Lehar's latest—a 'song play' entitled 'Friederike'—commits another error, fatal to good taste, by dragging Goethe's majestic figure on to the stage in the guise of an insipid and sentimental tenor-singing lover. The entire entertainment, conceived in the innocent spirit of the former generation, thus offends the taste of that epoch by catering to the bad instincts of the present one. No less sentimental, though with an added touch of timely frivolity, was Oscar Straus's newest piece, 'Wedding in Hollywood.'

VIENNA'S ORCHESTRAS

The coming season will find a new order of things without big orchestral societies. At the Konzertverein Paul von Klenau has abandoned a portion of his duties, and Bruno Walter and Fritz Busch will step in to fill the gap, conducting two of the four choral concerts, the remaining two being in the hands of Klenau, and Leopold Reichwein retaining his conductorship of the orchestral concerts. The Tonkünstler Orchestra has been completely reorganized. Rudolf Nilius has resigned, and Hans Knappertsbusch, Bruno Walter, Hermann Abendroth, and Nikolai Malko (the head of the Leningrad Philharmonic Orchestra) will share his former duties. Robert Heger remains with the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, sharing the choral series with Furtwängler, and the orchestral with Oswald Kabasta, from Graz.

The last of the season's orchestral events was a charity concert combining the Philharmonic and Symphony Orchestras into a unit of about two hundred and forty players under the direction of Franz Schalk. Schalk, about to retire from his directorship of the Staatsoper, was much honoured at that concert, and had the satisfaction of seeing a sold-out house in the hall in which Richard Strauss had just before conducted—for the same charitable cause—to a small audience.

RECITALS

Among the vocal recitals of the spring season the most successful was the debut of Paul Robeson, the remarkable negro bass who, with his singing of the Negro Spirituals, reaped a success such as otherwise falls only to the lot of favourite operatic tenors. Slightly disappointing were the concerts of Celestino Sarobe, heralded as the new Battistini and credited with the latter's tutorship. Sarobe's brittle voice and rather crudely and obtrusively enforced forte tones justified no such comparison, nor the title of a bel canto master which Berlin—less scrupulous in matters of voice production—had rashly bestowed upon the Spanish singer. Ethyl Hayden, an American soprano with a successful record in her native country, proved herself an artist with a fine soprano voice and much musical culture as well as artistic methods. The merits of Cati Andreades, a young Greek contralto, lie less in the direction of vocal opulence than in a truly remarkable musicianship and astounding interpretative powers. Her singing of Greek folk-songs (without accompaniment) was very interesting, and her coming was one of the most gratifying events of the concert season.

AN UNPUBLISHED LETTER FROM MOZART TO HIS SISTER

BY C. B. OLDMAN

The following letter from Mozart to his sister has hitherto escaped the notice of the various editors of the composer's correspondence. It was formerly in the collection of the late Ernst Perabo, of Boston, and was recently presented to the British Museum, with a number of other autographs from the same source, by his friend and pupil Mr. E. Perry Warren. It appears to have been purchased at an auction sale held by Messrs. List & Francke, at Leipsic, on June 12, 1882. It must be confessed that its intrinsic interest is not very great. Mozart's relations with his sister had been somewhat strained ever since his marriage to Constanze Weber in 1782 (it is notorious that neither Marianne nor her father could ever take to the lady), and he was no longer able to unbosom himself as freely to her as in the days of his early triumphs. But we possess so few letters of the composer from the years when his reputation was at its height that any addition to their number is welcome. By way of explanation it need only be added that 'Don Giovanni' was first produced at Prague on October 27, 1787, and that Mozart's appointment as 'Kaiserlicher Kammerkomponist' dated from December 7, 1787.

TRANSLATION

'Vienna, Dec. 19, 1787.

'Dearest Sister,

'I most humbly beg your pardon for having left you so long without an answer. Of my writing "Don Juan" for Prague and of the opera's triumphant success you may have heard already, but that His Majesty the Emperor has now taken me into his service will probably be news to you. I am sure you will be very pleased to hear it.

'Will you please send me the box with my scores as soon as possible? As for recent pianoforte music of my own, will you just note down the themes of the pieces I have sent you from Vienna and send them to me, so that I shan't send you anything twice over? This will be to your advantage as well as mine.

'Well, good-bye, dear sister. Write to me frequently. If I don't always answer promptly, put it down not to any negligence on my part but simply to stress of work. Adieu.

'I embrace you heartily and remain ever,

'Your true affectionate brother,

'W. A. MOZART.

'P.S.—From my wife, whom I am expecting back at any moment, a thousand kisses. Best regards to your worthy husband from us both.'

THE ALLIANCE OF SINGERS, COMPOSERS, AND CONDUCTORS

The final meeting of the fifty-fifth session of the Musical Association was held on April 23, when Dr. Cyril B. Rootham, of Cambridge, read a paper with the above title. He said that the voice was the oldest and still the most expressive instrument we had; and still (generally speaking) we could not hear the words of most singers—soloists, choirs, and choruses—when they held forth in public. The clear pronunciation of our splendid English language was still in jeopardy. The concert-room, the stage, the place of worship, could and should be schools where the greatness of our language, both in speech and song, was finely set forth. The English language, with its wide range of vowels, was a fine vehicle for expression.

All singers should have a good working knowledge of modes, and major and minor scales, without which it was difficult to understand and sing music of various styles and periods well, and they must be able to read at sight. But the interpretation of vocal music demanded much more than all that. Control of breath, phrasing, knowledge of the use and abuse of the bar-lines, were all essential. Chorus-singers must hear other parts than their own, so as to understand the general texture, to know when to be prominent, when to be in the background.

In 16th-century and much 17th-century polyphony the bar-lines had little to do with accent; one voice-part might, in the course of twenty bars, have phrasing which would require, for exact barring, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 in a bar. After experience of the method of constant change of time-signature it would seem preferable to keep a constant 2, 3, or 4 in a bar, for the obvious convenience of conducting. This method was the more practical and less fussy.

Turning to Recitative, the lecturer pointed out that when Purcell sets English, when Bach sets German, when Mozart sets either German or Italian, then the music should be sung in strict time, or at any rate in as strict time as any other sort of music was sung. For it was clear that each of these three composers, at any rate, took the greatest pains to get the exact declamation they wanted by their use of notes and rests.

Conductors and chorus-trainers were beginning to find out that the human voice, even in the mass, could be induced to obtain all sorts of perfectly legitimate changes of tone according to the sense and meaning of the words to be sung. This was especially the case in music of the type of Handel's choruses, which were mostly written with a wonderful intuition for what was essentially dramatic.

All composers of any repute in the 20th century could score for orchestra quite well, if not brilliantly, but it was often far otherwise with their vocal technique. Much of the choral writing was either dull and unimaginative, or else ill-conceived for voices; in other words, the composers had not attempted to sing themselves and so find out what was 'apt for voices.' Not only was this so, but some composers who seemed otherwise to know a good deal about vocal writing suddenly struck consternation into the hearts of conductors and chorus-trainers by writing low C's for the basses and high C's for the sopranos, forgetting that for the average good chorus-singer there was all the difference between one note in the highest register of the voice and the note next above it. Straining after effect, whether by means of unusually high or low notes, or of unnecessary complexity, or by conscious efforts on the composer's part to obtain fresh combinations of notes at all costs—all this did not make for originality; rather the reverse. Originality, as often as not, lay in the use of the simplest possible means in a new or unusual context.

Church music of the 16th and 17th century was at last being restored to its proper place in some of our cathedrals and collegiate chapels, and a few parish churches; it was occasionally sung also with real perception. The paramount reason which prompted some to wish to hear and take part in the best of this music was that it was eminently sincere, and therefore effective. To Elizabethan composers the Authorised Version of the Bible was a new thing—a wonderful and fresh source of verbal imagery and inspiration. Similarly the revised Book of Common Prayer appeared in 1661, and inspired the Restoration composers of Church music.

It was a matter for wonder that Purcell's magnificent anthems with ritornelli for strings were not more often given during service-time, particularly on great occasions. It had been said or written in history books, and glibly repeated, that Purcell's Church music was secular. To one who had been constantly a singer, player, conductor, or listener when these anthems had been performed at service-time or on solemn occasions in church, this remark was simply ridiculous.

As he listened to rehearsals Dr. Rootham said he often wished that more conductors had learned how to sing. It was difficult, if not impossible, for a conductor to indicate to a choir the varied nuances of tone, phrasing, and general effect that he might wish for if he could not produce his own voice properly. It would be a good thing also if he occasionally, at a final rehearsal, left his rostrum for the body of the hall and there listened to his forces. In most large halls the conductor's desk was the worst place for hearing the general effect.

Conductors grouped their forces in various ways. In the lecturer's opinion the best way to group a chorus on the concert-platform was not on the usual lines (the tenors and basses behind the sopranos and contraltos) but in wedge-shaped masses, each section (tenors, sopranos, contraltos, basses—from left to right) having a front facing the conductor and the audience. If there was also an orchestra, instruments should be grouped near the voices they usually supported.

Proposals had been made to abolish the conductor, who had of late years assumed undue importance. Virtuosi in anything were inclined to spoil matters. In performance, the conductor should not be unduly conspicuous; his work should have been done at rehearsal. Too much prominence of the conductor distracted the audience's attention from the music. In any case, exaggerated gestures were signs either of vanity or incompetence. The members of an audience, or newspaper critics, who demanded or upheld display from a singer, player, or conductor were not very far on their way to knowledge of the significance of great music.

A number of illustrations to Dr. Rootham's paper were sung by a small choir drawn from the Cambridge University Madrigal Society, under the direction of Mr. Bernhard Ord.

Obituary

We regret to record the following deaths:

DAVID DAY, at Eastbourne, aged seventy-nine. He was the founder of the music-publishing firm of Messrs. Francis, Day, & Hunter, and a prominent figure in the variety-theatre and entertainment world. Coming to London at an early age, he entered the publishing firm of Messrs. Hopwood & Crew. Shortly afterwards he met the brothers Francis, who were engaged with another music firm, and joined with them in launching the Mohawk Minstrels at the Agricultural Hall. The Minstrels were highly successful, and the firm of Francis Brothers & Day was formed in 1877, mainly in order to publish the songs performed by the Mohawks.

A. H. PEPPIN, at Sitcombe Vicarage, Somerset, on May 28. He was born at Wells, in 1865, his father being priest-vicar of Wells Cathedral and Vicar of Horrington. He studied at the Royal College of Music, and for a time lived at Toynbee Hall, acting as secretary to Sir George Grove. In 1896 he was appointed Director of Music at Clifton College, remaining there until 1915, when he took up a similar appointment at Rugby, resigning in 1925. He was a great power in public school music. At Clifton he started instrumental 'house' competitions, and also inaugurated orchestral concerts. A few years ago he published through the Oxford University Press a book entitled 'Public Schools and their Music,' in which his ideals and practical experience are set forth. In 1923 he was ordained, and became a curate at Rugby. In the following year he was appointed Vicar of Shepton Montague, Somerset, and later of Sitcombe.

MAX MOSSEL, at The Hague, aged fifty-seven. He was a native of Rotterdam, where he was born on July 25, 1871. His teachers were Willy Hess and Sarasate, and his first appearance was in 1876, with the Bommel Orchestral Society, Holland. His English debut was at a Crystal Palace Saturday concert in 1892. After extensive tours through the United Kingdom, Belgium, Spain, and Holland, he settled at Birmingham, and became a professor at the Midland Institute. He also directed the Birmingham Promenade Orchestral Concerts, and led the Max Mossel String Quartet. For the past nineteen years he had been a professor of the violin and of chamber music at the Guildhall School of Music.

HUGO NOLTHENIUS, at Haarlem, on June 8. He was born at Amsterdam, on December 20, 1848, and was the doyen of Dutch music teachers, and in his earlier days shared with Henri Viotta and Daniel de Lange in the work of arousing a new musical life in Holland. Originally a teacher of languages, he became conductor of various choral societies in Amsterdam, Utrecht, and Naarden, and was co-founder and editor with Viotta of the Weekblad voor Muziek. Up to the time of his death he was a member of the Committee of Toonkunst, and was taken ill while assisting with the preparation for the centenary celebrations. At one time he had considerable success as a composer of songs.

W. H. DOBSON, a native of Carlisle, at Stirling. For over thirty years he was organist and choirmaster of the East Parish Church, Stirling. He was conductor of Stirling Operatic Society, and a successful choral conductor at competitive musical festivals.

FRED C. WELLING, on April 26. He had done good work at various E. London churches, and at the time of his death, which occurred after a short illness, was choirmaster and organist at St. Andrew's, Plaistow.

LADY BRIDGE (widow of Sir Frederick Bridge), at Cairnbarrow Lodge, Aberdeenshire, on June 15.

The seventh annual conference of the East Anglian Association of Musical Societies was held at Diss on June 8. The occasion also celebrated the centenary year of the Diss Choral Society, and it further took the form of a commemoration of Wilbye, who was born at Diss. Twelve of Wilbye's madrigals were sung by the Felixstowe Madrigal Society, under Mr. Maurice Vinden, and an address on Elizabethan music was given by Dr. Fellowes.——A Summer School, the second held by the Association, has been arranged at Bury St. Edmunds on August 24-31, under the direction of Mr. Hubert Middleton.

The old-established Sheffield Amateur Musical Society (hon. secretary, Mr. Boyd Roberts; conductor, Dr. Frederic Staton) last year found itself with a deficit of over £300 and a membership that had dropped to half its usual total. There was talk of disbanding, but more plucky counsels prevailed, and as a result the Society will start next autumn's work with three hundred members and the deficit turned into a small balance. Congratulations!

Technique AND Expression In Pianoforte Playing

By FRANKLIN TAYLOR

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express myself more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

CHORALES

From the

Church Cantatas and Motets

Of

J. S. BACH

THIS Collection of Chorales is made with a view to various purposes. Primarily they may be used as short unaccompanied Motets or Anthems, or as choral items in an Organ Recital, especially in conjunction with Chorale Preludes on the tunes sung. The tunes themselves may serve as alternative settings to well-known hymns for special occasions.

THE SOWER

A HARVEST CANTATA
BY HAROLD DARKE

The words selected from Biblical and other sources
BY CLAUDE AVELING

DR. HAROLD DARKE has written a work for which Church musicians have long waited—a festival Cantata for Harvest Thanksgiving Services and other occasions. It is a straightforward, dignified work, simple, but with fine choral writing, not too much solo work (for soprano, tenor, alto, and baritone), and ending with a hymn for congregation and choir together—the well-known "Lasst uns Erfreuen." The Sower is of the best school of English Church Music; effective in any church: the text suitable both for the special occasion of Harvest and at other times: it will no doubt become a standard work all over the country.

PASTORAL

For Chorus, (Mezzo-Soprano Solo), Solo Flute, Drums, and String Orchestra.

The Poems selected from the Works of BEN JONSON, JOHN FLETCHER, POLIZIANO, THEOCRITUS, and ROBERT NICHOLS.

By ARTHUR BLISS

Price Two Shillings and Sixpence

PRESS NOTICES :

Observer.—"The new Bliss work has a great deal that is beautiful to listen to, and some interesting modernities for singers and players to compass. The linking-up of poems from different literary periods with instrumental movements is successful, and the whole work hangs properly together. It must be heard again soon."

Manchester Guardian.—"It was worth while missing the second act of 'The Mastersingers' in order to hear Arthur Bliss's new 'Pastoral' produced by the Harold Brooke Choir at the Bishopsgate Institute. The great compliment implied is by no means an exaggeration. Mr. Bliss is not a feverishly productive composer, but when he does bring out a new work nowadays one may be certain to find it interesting and hardly less sure to enjoy it. Last night these high expectations were more than justified, for the 'Pastoral' at once impressed itself on one's mind as the most refreshingly spontaneous and individually conceived musical novelty one has heard for some time. . . The whole text is a little bucolic anthology chosen with exquisite taste and . . . admirably unified by the music. The scoring : . . . is like a fastidiously chosen and exactly appropriate binding. . . . It is possible to complain that in the declamatory sense the words are not entirely well set. In the wider poetical sense they could not have been treated more imaginatively or with greater charm and quickly responsive inventiveness. . . . The performance . . . usefully showed that an efficient small choir and a few players for the string parts are quite enough to do justice to this wholly delightful work."

The Times.—"There is a strength, a melodic beauty, and a complete individuality of idiom (if we except an obviously intentional compliment to Sir Edward Elgar, to whom the work is dedicated) which prove that the composer has now definitely found his feet. . . . Though less brilliant superficially than his earlier works, the 'Pastoral' is far more assured, and on that account never misses its effect. The choral writing is, in comparison with most modern works, remarkably straightforward."

Daily Mail.—"Nine or ten years ago Mr. Bliss was one of the young rebels of music. In the 'Pastoral' he is still vivacious, youthful, and unconventional enough—but in a way that will affright no one. The new work is extraordinarily attractive. The reapers sing boisterously, the naiads dreamily; echo discourages the love-lorn shepherd, and in 'The Pigeon Song' a flute adds charming decorations to a girl's amorous ditty. The composer's freshness and inventiveness well match the excellent verses."

Morning Post.—"The choral writing is in the true English tradition, and the musical idiom in general is entirely straightforward . . . The most sincere and musical expression of lyrical personality that I have heard from an English composer for a long time.

"Dix Pièces Sentimentales"

for PIANOFORTE SOLO

THESE ten small pieces form a counterpart to a similar collection by this Russian composer, "Dix Pièces Gaies," already published in the same edition, and which have met with such signal success.

As the title indicates, they are in contrast to that bright and cheerful set, but merely as regards their content, for in workmanship and invention they are equally exuberant.

In playing them through, one scarcely knows whether to be more delighted by their originality as a collection or by the extraordinarily varied manner in which this originality manifests itself in number after number.

Technically, the pieces are moderately difficult, but they require delicate handling and are therefore as useful for teaching purposes as they are attractive to play.

"Finger Magic"

HOW THE MASTER MUSICIAN IS MADE.

"I have been reading a little booklet which I have termed 'Finger Magic,' and I would very much like to place this book in the hands of every pianist, violinist, and 'cellist in the Kingdom.

"We all know that the secret of the virtuosi does not consist in the amount of time they expend in instrumental practice—one recently stated that he often does not touch the instrument for a week, and another has affirmed that musicians are positively superstitious about practice. The secret of the success of the great masters must therefore be looked for in another direction than in the capacity for hard grinding practice on orthodox lines, and I have been experimenting with a system which may well prove to be a solution, or at any rate to a large extent.

"The system to which I refer develops the hands not by practice in the ordinary sense, but by a series of exercises, based on sound psychological as well as physiological laws; the almost immediate effect of which is to increase the stretching capacity of the hand, and the descriptive booklet, issued by the Cowling Institute, contains some astonishing letters from musicians which would convince me, even if not backed up by my own experience, that the quickest and easiest way to develop the strength and flexibility of the wrist and fingers so essential to pianists, violinists, and 'cellists is to perform the operation away from the instrument, when the mind can be centred upon that object alone.

"I anticipate that within a measurable period the knowledge contained in this little booklet, and in the lessons given by the Cowling Institute, will form part of the curriculum of every teacher and be a necessary equipment of every violinist, 'cellist, and pianist."—

ERNEST JAY, F.R.C.O.

NOTE.—The booklet referred to above may be obtained free of all cost on application to Secretary, T., Cowling Institute, 71, Albion House, New Oxford Street, London, W.C.1. (State if a teacher.)

Can you play from memory?

"I am entirely satisfied with the results of your System. I am now able to play from memory with comfort. Many thanks." — (MUS. BAC., F.R.C.O.) Bournemouth. 5/6/29.

"It is a great treat to be able to play from memory, especially as I had considered that I had no faculty for doing so."—(TEACHER). York. 22/4/29.

"I must tell you how delighted I am to have already memorised the two pieces for the first lesson—for me, a feat little short of the marvellous."—(STUDENT) Ruislip. 11/6/29.

For Chorus, (Mezzo-Soprano Solo), Solo Flute, Drums, and String Orchestra.

The Poems selected from the Works of Ben Jonson, John Fletcher, Poliziano, Theocritus, and Robert Nichols.

By ARTHUR BLISS

Price Two Shillings and Sixpence

PRESS NOTICES :

Observer.—"The new Bliss work has a great deal that is beautiful to listen to, and some interesting modernities for singers and players to compass. The linking-up of poems from different literary periods with instrumental movements is successful, and the whole work hangs properly together. It must be heard again soon."

Manchester Guardian.—"It was worth while missing the second act of 'The Mastersingers' in order to hear Arthur Bliss's new 'Pastoral' produced by the Harold Brooke Choir at the Bishopsgate Institute. The great compliment implied is by no means an exaggeration. Mr. Bliss is not a feverishly productive composer, but when he does bring out a new work nowadays one may be certain to find it interesting and hardly less sure to enjoy it. Last night these high expectations were more than justified, for the 'Pastoral' at once impressed itself on one's mind as the most refreshingly spontaneous and individually conceived musical novelty one has heard for some time. . . The whole text is a little bucolic anthology chosen with exquisite taste and . . . admirably unified by the music. The scoring . . . is like a fastidiously chosen and exactly appropriate binding. . . . It is possible to complain that in the declamatory sense the words are not entirely well set. In the wider poetical sense they could not have been treated more imaginatively or with greater charm and quickly responsive inventiveness. . . . The performance . . . usefully showed that an efficient small choir and a few players for the string parts are quite enough to do justice to this wholly delightful work."

The Times.—"There is a strength, a melodic beauty, and a complete individuality of idiom (if we except an obviously intentional compliment to Sir Edward Elgar, to whom the work is dedicated) which prove that the composer has now definitely found his feet. . . . Though less brilliant superficially than his earlier works, the 'Pastoral' is far more assured, and on that account never misses its effect. The choral writing is, in comparison with most modern works, remarkably straightforward."

Daily Mail.—"Nine or ten years ago Mr. Bliss was one of the young rebels of music. In the 'Pastoral' he is still vivacious, youthful, and unconventional enough—but in a way that will affright no one. The new work is extraordinarily attractive. The reapers sing boisterously, the naiads dreamily; echo discourages the love-lorn shepherd, and in 'The Pigeon Song' a flute adds charming decorations to a girl's amorous ditty. The composer's freshness and inventiveness well match the excellent verses."

Morning Post.—"The choral writing is in the true English tradition, and the musical idiom in general is entirely straightforward . . . The most sincere and musical expression of lyrical personality that I have heard from an English composer for a long time.

F.R.C.O. AND A.R.C.O. PAPER WORK

A SPECIAL COURSE OF CORRESPONDENCE LESSONS for the January F.R.C.O. and A.R.C.O. Examinations is now commencing. The chief reason why this system of tuition is so successful is that pupils are taught how to work. Experience has proved that a large number of candidates fail because they do not reach a high enough standard in their work, which is often the result of training on wrong lines. Now in this system of tuition, pupils are taught to produce work which is above the standard required by the examiners.

F.R.C.O. pupils are trained to work on a definite plan in such tests as the String Quartet, Part-Song, Solo, so as to acquire speed, which is a most vital factor, especially in the afternoon, when so many candidates come to grief.

Hints on how to study the score selected for the January examination as well as a complete analysis (which will give answers to likely questions) will be sent to all pupils.

A.R.C.O. pupils receive special help with Free Counterpoint Pianoforte Accompaniment, and Four-Part Harmony. Questions on Choir-Training, Musical History, and Musical Form are included in the lessons.

The whole aim of this method is to teach the principles which underlie all highly artistic music, and also the application of these principles to examination work, so that a pupil who is thus equipped is enabled not only to pass the F.R.C.O. or A.R.C.O. examination, as the case may be, but also to develop to the utmost the musical ability with which he is endowed.

Technique AND Expression

In Pianoforte Playing

By FRANKLIN TAYLOR

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express myself more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

THE DRAMATISATION OF CHORAL WORKS: A TALK WITH THE PRODUCER OF 'HIAWATHA'

BY HARVEY GRACE

The success achieved by the dramatised version of 'Hiawatha' at the Royal Albert Hall during the past few years has no doubt set many musicians speculating as to how far the process may be applied to choral works in general. Exception may be taken (and with good cause) to an analogous treatment of instrumental music on the ground that it involves the imposition of an idea or interpretation undreamt of by the composer. The objection does not apply to the dramatisation of choral music, because the text makes it an implicit dramatic work. The dramatiser has to justify, not the process, but his choice of work and method of treatment.

With a view to obtaining light on some interesting questions that arise, I have interviewed Mr. T. C. Fairbairn, who was primarily responsible for the production of 'Hiawatha.'

I began by asking him as to the origin of his treatment of Coleridge-Taylor's popular work.

'It began in this way,' he replied. 'I had just finished producing the "Ring," for Denhof, in 1911, and was looking round for something for a big variety house. I had been thinking for a long time about the possibilities of "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast" when I met the composer at the house of Julian Henry, the baritone who had sung the title-rôle many times. Coleridge-Taylor was greatly interested in the idea, but the project came to nothing at the time. This was in 1912. During 1920, after my Surrey Theatre season of opera, I produced in the arena of the Albert Hall, "Cavalleria Rusticana" and the bigger scenes from Gounod's "Faust." This was the first time that the Albert Hall had been used in such a way and for such a purpose.'

'What followed this venture?'

'I was about to give, for the benefit of the Japanese Earthquake Fund, a performance in the same way and at the same place, of the whole of "Faust," when I enlisted the services of Mr. Sherwood Foster for the business-organization. This performance did not materialise, but Mr. Foster asked me if I would produce something in aid of the National Institute for the Blind. This I agreed to do, and as the Royal Choral Society was going to co-operate, I had of course to choose something from its répertoire. There were three of such works that I had already planned to do at some time or other—"Hiawatha," "Elijah," and "The Messiah." Finally it was decided to do "Hiawatha." As might be supposed, some people objected. I was told that the work was not written for the stage, and could not be produced that way. It was also suggested the Royal Choral Society could not sing without copies. This latter point was very quickly settled by the assurance of the Royal Choral Society officials and singers that they could sing from memory.

'One of the first and greatest difficulties was the enormous space that had to be covered by the backcloth—about 10,000 ft. The question of the weight was also important—so much so that we had to consult the architects as to the strain on the building. There was a further problem as to how to get this enormous sheet into position. The cloth was eventually placed in position by tapeing it on to a batten and hauled up by numerous pulleys, to another pliable hanging batten suspended from the roof supports. Mr. Palmer, of Barkers, was responsible for this, and a very talented scenic artist, Mr. Vincent, was the painter of the scenery. The choice of material was decided largely by the weight problem I have already mentioned. We finally decided to use blue casement cloth. This solved two difficulties: the material is very light, and owing to its colour very little paint was necessary, so we saved weight in that respect as well. When you have 10,000-ft. of surface to deal with, paint is literally a very heavy item! A scenic feature that caused a good deal of comment was the waterfall. "What became of the water?" people asked. Your readers may be interested to know that the waterfall discharged into a narrow stream that runs beneath the Albert Hall—one of London's many underground, long-forgotten rivers. The lighting was another feature remarked on. We used six lights, each of a million candle-power.'

T. C. FAIRBAIRN

'How did the rank and file of the Royal Choral Society take to the idea of becoming actors as well as singers?' I asked. 'And how did they face the heavy demands of a fortnight's run?'

'From the very first rehearsal they were enthusiastic,' replied Mr. Fairbairn. 'And so far from finding it a bore to "make up" and perform daily for a fortnight, they wished the run had been longer! Here I must pay a warm tribute to the energy and organising ability of Mr. Rothery, the Secretary, and to Dr. Malcolm Sargent for his masterly control of the multitude of performers. As to this question of run, I go so far as to suggest that further productions should be continuous—at all events during the winter—and that the membership of the Royal Choral Society should be increased for the purpose up to anything from two thousand to five thousand. The singers should be divided into sections, each learning a different work, so that they could rest in turn. Six different works could thus be performed, with six different companies working in rotation. And such productions should not be confined to the Albert Hall; I should like to see them given also at the Alexandra Palace, People's Palace, and Crystal Palace, so that the four quarters of London could have a constant musical spectacle. The performances should be broadcast. The income of the B.B.C. would be largely increased by such attractive fare. Such a scheme would provide thousands of people with an outlet for their artistic energy as actors, singers, and dancers. As to the attractiveness from the box-office point of view, the success of "Hiawatha" is sufficient proof. If this decentralised scheme were run with low charges of admission, the cinema would be up against a bigger rival than it has had so far. How could the ordinary "talkie" compete with such a show as "Hiawatha," which comprises speech, singing, acting, and dancing?'

Reverting to the broadcasting suggestion, I asked Mr. Fairbairn if performances of this kind would make good fare for listeners. Wouldn't they appeal to the eye rather than to the ear?

'No,' said Mr. Fairbairn; 'the broadcasts of opera are some of the best things the B.B.C. has done. The Commentary from Savoy Hill and the publication of the libretti in cheap form make things easy for the listener. Moreover, the choral works that would be performed in the way I suggest are already popular, and their stories are, in fact, far better known and less complicated than those of most operas. The wireless listener who can visualise the scenic part of an opera wouldn't be at a loss with a dramatised choral work.'

'Can "Hiawatha" be done elsewhere?' I asked.

'Certainly,' said Mr. Fairbairn. 'It can be done wherever there is a suitable hall. The ideal would be a natural outdoor amphitheatre

The Medicine Man

'O Pau-puk-keewis, dance for us your merry dances!'

with some water and trees adjacent, and also in the neighbourhood of a hall to which the performance could be transferred in bad weather.'

'Is it the case that you have been asked to take the production to America?'

'I have had three offers from the U.S.A. One prominent American impresario wished to take the production on tour to about thirty different towns. I have also had an offer to produce "Hiawatha" at the Niagara Falls—on the American side of the Falls, that is.'

(I ventured to suggest that the Canadian side would be even better, as Canada is well provided with large and efficient choral societies.)

Mr. Fairbairn went on to say that offers are not limited to English-speaking countries. 'I have been approached by a manager who wants to do it at Budapest, Vienna, and Berlin.'

'Does this mean that you would take an English chorus?'

'No,' said Mr. Fairbairn, 'a German version of the "Wedding-Feast" already exists; the other two parts would have to be translated. The Budapest performances would, of course, involve a Hungarian text.'

I suggested that there must be other works that would lend themselves well to this method of presentation.

'Yes,' said Mr. Fairbairn. 'I have already arranged "Elijah," "Judas Maccabæus," "Israel in Egypt," "The Golden Legend," and "The Messiah." These are all ready for production. We have also prepared a dramatic presentation of a programme of well-known Christmas carols. There is no lack of material.'

A point that will naturally occur to the reader is the possible effect of a dramatised performance on the actual singing of the choir. With this in mind, I mentioned that at the Albert Hall this year I speculated as to how far the brilliant singing of the Royal Choral Society may have been due to the fact that the method of presentation made the text more vital to them.

'That is so,' said Mr. Fairbairn. 'The greatly increased sense of reality helps singers enormously. With copies in their hands they are apt to be merely reading, so far as the words are concerned. With the whole work memorised and with the singers taking their part in the acting, words and music are vitalised in a way that is hardly possible—or rarely met with—in "straight" choral performances.'

The Ballet of the Happy Hunting-Ground

What has Mr. Fairbairn's method to do with choral societies, especially in small centres? The answer is suggested by the difficulties under which they are working to-day. Let us summarise these difficulties: Choral societies are not attracting members—especially young members—or audiences as they did twenty years ago. It is not that people are less fond of music, but that the taste of to-day, influenced by the cinema and by profusely illustrated daily journals, demands something with movement, drama, and colour. A partial response to this demand is made by an occasional concert performance of an opera, but in most works of the kind the chorus music does not interest the singers for long, nor is it sufficiently difficult or well-written to do them any good technically. The Festival movement has brought into existence a large number of choirs, especially in villages and country towns. These choirs—many of them excellent in quality—can hardly continue to exist either musically or financially on a few part-songs prepared for competitive purposes; and a substantial choral work, it is found, rarely attracts a full hall.

Side by side with these hard facts put this other one—that amateur operatic societies are everywhere on the increase, and are steadily attracting performers and audiences who in pre-war days would have been the mainstay of local choralism. Amateur opera is good fun, but from a purely musical point of view it cannot be compared with choral singing, which has always been, and still is, England's strong suit. The operatic society is a welcome addition to the choral society, but artistically it can never be a substitute.

A suggestion that choral societies should adopt and adapt the Fairbairn idea will cause some of the old brigade to raise pained and astonished eyebrows. (A few years ago my own eyebrows would have been raised as high as anybody's.) But changed conditions call for changed methods, or at least for a frank discussion of them. And if it is permissible to give a concert performance of an opera, why should we not give an operatic version of a cantata? Further conversation with Mr. Fairbairn has convinced me that his method of presenting choral works can be applied by any normally well-equipped choir that has behind it energy and enterprise. It would be a mistake to suppose that the Albert Hall 'Hiawatha' is the only possible way. That real waterfall, those million-candle-power lights, the impressive back-cloth, and other effects, striking as they were, did not make the phenomenal success of 'Hiawatha.' The prime factor was the chorus. Any choral society that can memorise a work and achieve a diction both clear and significant, has already the chief essentials towards a successful dramatised version. As for producer: there are few districts without some person experienced in amateur theatricals. Costumes? A small sub-committee with gumption and neat, contriving fingers can do wonders at very little cost. The innumerable pageants given about twenty years ago up and down the country—many are being given at the present time—showed that in every district there is no lack of people with a natural gift for dealing with the various sides of dramatic production. Fairbairnised choralism would attract as helpers many non-singing but useful folk of this kind. Choral societies who find the normal methods still profitable will wisely stick to them. The rest will no less wisely consider the moral of Mr. Fairbairn's version of 'Hiawatha,' especially as (the fact must be insisted on) dramatised choralism leads, not to worse singing, but to better. The half-learned, unconvincing, one-eye-on-the-copy-all-the-time variety won't do. It was good enough for the ordinary concert—on second thoughts, though, was it? Could we but know, we should probably find that it was largely responsible for the dwindling support of which choral societies complain. They must try to recover that support; and if choralism of the penny-plain type won't do it, they must be prepared to try the tuppence-coloured variety.

RHYTHM IN SINGING, AND ELSEWHERE

By W. S. Drew

(Concluded from July number, p. 600)

The desire to keep a song moving in a particular way is no doubt the outcome of a certain artistic insight, but the power to bring this desire to fruition is the result, as in other forms of artistic achievement, of technique. The technical secret of such masters of rhythmical singing as Plunket Greene and Sir Harry Lauder lies in a special kind of neatness of the diction muscles which enables awkward combinations of consonants to be articulated rapidly and clearly, and so permits the following vowel sounds to be placed with the greatest accuracy 'on the beat.' In unaccompanied singing the beats of the bar are indicated to the listener by the incidence of the vowels. To borrow a metaphor from the parade ground—the consonants are purely cautionary, the word of command is the vowel.

For the unvoiced consonants and their combinations (p, t, k, st, &c.) the necessity for anticipation introduces no complications other than a nice adjustment of the anticipation or suspense to the strength of the emphasis required.* But the continuants (l, m, n, v, &c.) introduce questions of pitch or intonation which have to be considered carefully. For if these sounds have to be sung before the note to which they are apparently written it is obviously necessary to decide exactly what is the pitch of the note on which they must be sung. Many singers whose rhythmical and dramatic instincts are perfectly sound spoil the style of their singing by not definitely deciding this question for themselves; in fact, a good many of them do not seem to know even that there is a question to decide. In any case the result is a blurred, scooping attack. This is a blemish which is very prevalent among opera singers. It is very disfiguring and quite unnecessary, for the dramatic emphasis which it is designed to effect can be produced more satisfactorily by a much cleaner style of intonation.

There are two ways in which this can be done: either by singing the initial continuant on the same note as the following vowel, or by singing it on a lower note, which note may itself be either the note of the preceding syllable or one which fits in with the harmony of the preceding beat:

In Ex. 9 it looks curious to write the 'R' to a D sharp, but none the less it is the best way to start the phrase if a clean and effective emphasis is required. All these attacks can of course be done on the same note as the first of the following bar, but if a really telling emphasis is wanted, the attacks suggested are best, as anyone may find by trying the various alternatives. In each case the jump should be a clean one, with no intermediate notes. What this all amounts to is that when great emphasis is required it is not only allowable but actually necessary to sing such sounds on a lower note. It should be pointed out also that the notation should be taken literally,† i.e., the anticipated attack should be on a note, not a rapidly ascending scale of notes. Certain plaintive and legitimately sentimental effects can be got by this last method, but it requires much skill and delicacy to make it tolerable, and its effect fades very rapidly with the frequency of its use.

The other occasions on which singers are misled by musical notation are those that are connected with the taking of breath. When there are a few bars of instrumental prelude or interlude there is obviously no excuse for the singer who does not realise that he must fill his lungs a beat or two before the time that the instrumental rhythm has fixed for him to begin. Apart from this, however, composers seem to take a malicious delight in misleading the unwary beginner by indicating that the sound is to be continuous when, indeed, it is obvious that a breath must be taken. Some composers or editors go so far as to prolong a note by a dot in the musical notation and then to contradict it by writing a comma for a breath.

No one thinks it necessary to tell a child to fill his lungs before he begins to howl; nor, at a later date in his life, to point out that there must be air in the lungs before he begins to speak. Thus everyone really knows the rule for breathing during a song, namely, that a breath must be taken before a verbal phrase is started. If the composer writes his musical phrases so that this is difficult or impossible, so much the worse for the composer, for even the most amphibious of singers has to come up to breathe occasionally. In this connection, however, even the best of composers have to be edited to some extent, and it is true also that great song-writers vary considerably in what may be called the instinct for verbal phrasing.*

Since rhythmical 'landmarks' are defined by the incidence of the note, it follows that in this connection its duration is of minor importance; i.e., one may play a waltz measure either sostenuto or staccato without disturbing the dancing. From which it follows again that this editing for breathing purposes consists in cutting short the duration of the last note of a phrase so that the first note of the next one may not be late. Often there is no time to do more than just to touch the last note and snatch a breath immediately. Another small problem that the composer often sets the singer is to give him a short verbal phrase, with plenty of time to take a breath before it, followed immediately by a long phrase with no rest in front of it. The obvious solution is to take a full breath before the short phrase so that only a very short time is needed between the two phrases to refill the lungs. Want of attention to such details causes just that very slight displacement of accent which is sufficient to make any singing rhythmically ineffective.

A song which is uncomfortably phrased for the singer is by no means necessarily a bad one. No one need condemn Schumann's 'Die Rose, die Lilie . . .' merely because a full-stop is crowded in between two consecutive semiquavers, and because there is one rest, of a semiquaver only, throughout the whole song. Nor need one refuse to sing 'Slumber, beloved,' from Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio' because there are twenty-eight bars without a rest. The general conception of a song is of more importance than the details of its phrasing. A skilful singer can make a success of a song which is well conceived but badly phrased by the composer; but he cannot succeed with one where these merits and faults are interchanged.

* I think it is better to sing the words as Shakespeare wrote them and sing through the rest rather than follow the many editions which write 'To her eyes doth love repair.'

* Mr. Ernest Newman has brought out this point very clearly in his comparison of the song-writing of Brahms and Wolf.

It is best for the singer to deal with all these difficulties in practice by learning the music and the words separately. It has already been suggested that the melody of a new song—or of an old one for that matter—should be learnt as a vocal exercise by using the voice as a musical instrument. The words should also be studied carefully, and read aloud till they are known by heart and can be made to sound intelligible and interesting without the aid of the music. If the singer cannot make a success of these feats when tried separately, he is not within measurable distance of making their combination interesting to other people, however much he may enjoy the attempt himself. When these two sides of the art are well mastered separately, the difficulty of their blending, which is really the essence of the art of singing, seems to be overcome without any special conscious effort—except that which is the natural outcome of an imperfect technique, for one cannot arrange with the composer to have one's favourite note and favourite vowel sound coinciding at the climax of each crescendo.

The realisation that there are certain parts of the music which must not be interfered with leads to that unconscious anticipation which prevents one from taking a breath just at the moment when it is necessary to begin a phrase. On the other hand, a careful attention to the intelligent and unaffected presentation of the words brings about the realisation that vocal music is subtly different from instrumental music, and almost always requires a more flexible interpretation. As we have seen before, in passages where the syllables of commonly occurring words are written to be sung to notes of which the duration is nominally equal, the music must not insist on being taken too literally, for indeed the amount that it has to give way is usually so small as to be imperceptible by anything except some mechanical recording apparatus.

The question will certainly be asked here, How is it possible, or why should we trouble, to make differences in duration which are not directly recognised as such? The answer is that these minute differences are not made on the one hand or recognised on the other by thinking about differences of duration, but by thinking of the sound of familiar words.* In the visual world one has no difficulty in distinguishing immediately between two friends whose faces are somewhat similar, but one would be very hard put to it to say by how much the face of one was broader than that of the other, or which had the longer nose.

The mention of an independent method of measuring the exact equality of time-intervals brings us back once again to the question of rhythm and regularity. The business of the musician is not to play metronomically in time, but to play in a way that is satisfactory to the listener's expectation of regularity. This, so far as the beats of a bar are concerned, is not satisfied by exact mechanical equality unless the beats are all of exactly the same loudness. We are once again confronted with the interesting paradox that it is not possible for anyone to appear to play in time without actually playing out of time. A series of exactly equidistant beats can only be divided into groups (and equal grouping is the essence of rhythm) for the ear* by making certain beats louder than others. This of course is the conventional accent on the first beat of the bar. As soon as this is done, however, the duration between the beats no longer sounds equal. Experiment shows that an accented beat tends to make the duration of the preceding measure appear shorter and that of the following one longer. Musicians and singers with any skill had discovered this fact long before it was confirmed by experimental psychology, and had learned to delay accented beats sufficiently for them to fit in correctly with their own and their hearers' desire for that particular kind of æsthetic satisfaction. There is no doubt that the ear is sensitive to extremely minute variations of such 'suspenses,' and, although they are not interpreted directly as differences in time-duration, their artistic effect in the aggregate is enormous.

We need not, however, have recourse to the apparatus of the psychological laboratory in order to clear up certain difficulties with regard to time and rhythm, for the muscular sense gives us an independent method of judging equality of time-intervals. Some people who are poor musicians (as the term is usually understood) are good dancers, and the criticisms of such people about the performance of dance music are as valuable as those of the more musical. Dancing and music (or some kind of ear-stimulation) have always been very closely connected. The physiological and psychological facts connected with this do not matter for the moment, since there is a very simple practical reason for it.† If a number of people are required to execute movements in time with one another, it is easier to conduct them by sound than by sight, for the sight method as a rule would necessitate their facing all in the same direction.

A waltzer is not upset by dotted crotchets, although his feet are moving regularly in time,

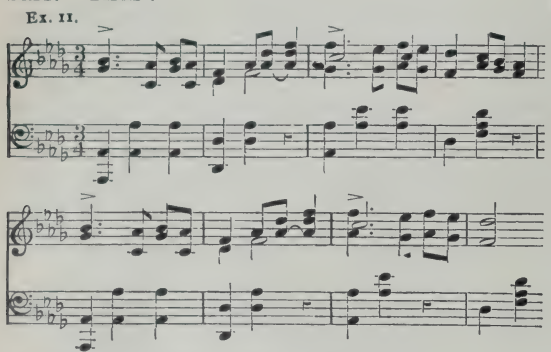
* 'The mind in the poetic experience responds to subtler niceties than these, too slight indeed to be at any moment objects of distinct consciousness, yet become considerable in their aggregate influence.'—Coleridge: 'Biographia Litteraria.'

* For the eye it is done by bar-lines.

† People who naturally remember things by ear (as opposed to the visual type) usually have strong muscular memories. The sensations of muscular tension in the organs of diction are for obvious reasons associated much more with sound than with sight in all normal people.

or nearly so. He does not expect the individual beats of the musical accompaniment to coincide with the beats of his feet, in fact he would probably find it dull if they did.* But no one could dance at all comfortably if the bars of a waltz are not very nearly of equal length. The reason for the two-bar unit previously suggested as most suitable for the waltz will now be clear. If we are beating sets of three beats regularly with alternate feet, one bar will have two lefts with a right in between and the next will have two rights with a left in between. That is to say, there will be a group of six steps before the pattern of muscular sensations re-commences with the left foot on the strong musical beat of the bar. Thus in good waltz-playing there should every now and then be made clear a subtle distinction between the odd and even bars. Thus :

Ex. 11.



Waltzes played in such a way tend to go with a swing—which phrase is the colloquial way of expressing the satisfaction felt from the correlation of the muscular and musical sensations. When played with a steady equal accent on the first beat of every bar they tend to become jerky and monotonous to dance to, although certain eminently satisfactory musical effects can be obtained from the shorter rhythmical unit.

It is characteristic of the world of art that small physical differences such as those that we have been discussing are often responsible for very large psychological effects. If we tried to express the time differences between good and bad rhythm in seconds it would come to a very small fraction indeed, whereas the difference in the pleasure given by the two kinds of playing is recognised without the slightest difficulty. There is a simple enough explanation of this discrepancy between the apparent size of the cause (measured in one way) and that of the effect (measured in another), the gist of which may be understood by considering whether the throwing of a stone will cause an avalanche. It can easily be seen that this will happen only when several other 'causes' are ready to operate.

The inability to grasp these facts is responsible for the invention of that convenient genie, 'Personality,' which the pseudo-philosopher produces from his brass bottle as an independent cause to explain anything which puzzles him.

* Mr. Plunket Greene in his writings about rhythm has brought out very clearly the fascination of this form of hide and seek.

ELGAR'S 'FALSTAFF' RECONSIDERED

By Percy A. Scholes

In the June issue of the Musical Times, 'H. G.' raises a most interesting and important question—nothing less than that of How to Listen to Programme Music.

Elgar's 'Falstaff' is the occasion of the discussion. I had in a certain book described that great work as 'so far as public appreciation goes a comparative failure,' and given as the reason that 'the events and passions represented succeed one another so rapidly that even the most conscientious listener, with his eye on the programme book which details the happenings, must inevitably lose his way and find himself struggling to read into some passage a thought or emotion that belongs to a previous or subsequent moment.'

To this 'H. G.' (I think, on the whole, wisely) replies, 'Drop the programme book and listen in a more general way.' He says that he and his friends never really enjoyed or understood this work until they started taking the composition 'merely as a splendid piece of music, with the fat knight at the back of their mind.'

He adds a generalisation : 'A point-to-point setting doesn't always call for a point-to-point hearing,' and then, returning to the particular work in question, adds, '"Falstaff" is gorgeous in sum because of its extraordinary wealth of detail. Our concern is with the sum.' (There is a lot to discuss in that last suggestion, but I shall have to neglect it in the present article. For the moment I will only say that I do not quite know how one can take in a time-art 'in the sum.')*

I have just said that I think 'H. G.' advises wisely when he tells us to drop the programme book. When 'Falstaff' comes round, the 'Prom.' programme always gives us quite a solid article of a thousand words, with the 'order of going in' very carefully laid down ; I have, however, never heard of any 'Prom.' listener who found the thousandth word and the final note coincide, unless he had intelligently discovered that (say) the words 'solo bassoon gives out coarsely his lying theme' had come before his eye at the point where Falstaff's snoring is heard from the double-bassoons and tuba, and effected a hasty adjustment—and unless he had been clever enough to act with similar presence of mind many times during the performance.

So I think 'H. G.' advises rightly when he tells us to turn our backs for once on our admired Rosa Newmarch and to let our minds stroll about London and the Gloucester orchards uncompanioned and without ever quite knowing in which street or orchard they are.

* Where is the difficulty ? Although music is a time-art, it is made of details that can easily be separated. Wherever there are separable details, there must also be a sum.—H. G.

But that is not to say that the work is any the less 'a comparative failure,' for in following 'H. G.'s' advice we are surely but 'making the best of a bad job.' The composer never meant us to listen in that general way. There may, as 'H. G.' says, be works point-to-point-composed, but not intended to be point-to-point-heard, but can this be one of them? The generalisation may apply to certain compositions where the 'points' are few, consisting of the representation of broad incidents or emotions, such as cannot have hampered their composer in the normal musical development of his themes, but can it apply to a composition like this, where the composer has had every phrase and almost every note of his music imposed on him by the attempt to follow out a series of a hundred happenings? Can it be that any composer would submit to such close literary and pictorial control with the intention that his listeners should know nothing about it—or knowing, should deliberately attempt to avoid the application of their knowledge?

Now the programme notes of Mrs. Newmarch and others are not entirely of their own devising. They have authority—the best authority, that of the Musical Times. Indeed, they have the authority of the composer, for it was he who, in the issue of September, 1913, supplied the splendid nine-column description which was intended to prepare listeners for the work's first performance at the Leeds Festival in the following month.

In that description the score, though continuous, is considered under four 'divisions.' Division 1 opens with a theme in which we see Sir John 'in a green old age, mellow, frank, gay, easy, corpulent, loose, unprincipled, and luxurious,' and another of which we are told 'the gargantuan, wide-compassed fortissimo first given to the strings in three octaves exhibits his boastfulness and colossal mendacity.' There is a theme in which the Prince is suggested in his most courtly and genial mood. Of the passage in which these themes first occur it is said, 'As the scene is mainly a conversation, the music consists of a presentation and variation of these themes, ending with an impetuous rush of Example 1—the persuasive Falstaff has triumphed, the dominating Sir John is in the ascendant.'

(Now why does the composer give us these details if he wishes us to ignore them?)

In Division 2 'we are in Eastcheap and plunge into a quicker tempo commencing with a theme made up of short, brisk phrases.' The passage was 'suggested by the following paragraph' (in Dowden's Shakespeare):

> 'From the coldness, the caution, the convention of his father's Court, Prince Henry escapes to the teeming vitality of the London streets and the tavern where Falstaff is monarch. There, among ostlers and carriers, and drawers, and merchants, and pilgrims, and loud robustious women, he at least has freedom and frolic.'

Then we are told that 'the musical illustration of the Tavern would not be complete without the Hostess and Doll Tearsheet, if not the "dozen or fourteen honest gentlewomen," so a suggestion [given in music type] of the theme associated with this most virtuous company flits across the fabric to find its full expression later.'

And thus the description of Division 2 goes on, with slices of musical quotations interlarded, which are definitely attached by the composer to 'the short struggle for a twice-stolen booty,' the 'discomfiture of the thieves' ('quavers hurried and scrambling'), the arrival of the thieves at the 'Boar's Head,' 'the knight again attempting speech,' Falstaff's sleep, and so forth.

(Now would any composer tell us all this, wishing us to forget it?)

Division 3 gives us themes of Falstaff's awakening, 'a dozen captains . . . knocking at the tavern and asking for Sir John Falstaff,' the march of the soldiers, Falstaff's joking in the face of danger, the march and the 'rest in Shallow's orchard,' some 'sadly-merry pipe and tabor music,' Pistol's announcement of the accession of Henry V., Falstaff's 'glorying in the news,' and so forth.

(Now can we suppose that Elgar was deliberately wasting valuable 'Musical Times' space, and that all this is useless to the listener?)

Division 4 gives the King passing on his way to Westminster Abbey, with 'his approach suggested by a strenuous version of Ex. 2, recalling the merry times at Gadshill, the orchestration now heavier and the import serious.' 'The climax comes with Ex. 5, fully harmonized and extended when the King appears, "Glittering in golden coat . . . and gorgeous as the sun at midsummer." Then, with a rush of quavers, the Falstaff theme (Ex. 1) is given fortissimo, and the King halts. A brief parley ensues, but Falstaff is inexorably swept aside by the King's brazen motto, and the last pitiful attempt at cajolery is rudely blasted by the furious fanfare (Ex. 16):

> "How ill white hairs become a fool and jester—
> I banish thee on pain of death."

Immediately the royal march is resumed, and dies away; the King has looked on his ancient friend for the last time.'

So the music and its description go on—'the broken man,' 'the death scene,' the 'cry of sack and of women,' a 'terrible nightmare version of the women's theme,' the fading of intelligence and the 'nerveless final struggles and collapse'—'the brass holds pianissimo a full chord of C major and Falstaff is dead.'

Would Elgar tell us all this if he thought the knowledge of it would merely embarrass us?

If Elgar had wished to provide 'merely a splendid piece of music, with the fat knight at the back of his mind,' he could assuredly have done so. Evidently that was not his intention. I do not want to be dogmatic, but it seems to me that Falstaff is the musical equivalent of a magnificent but much too rapid cinematograph film.

I stick to my view that 'Falstaff' is 'so far as public appreciation goes a comparative failure,' and that the composer and not the public is to blame for this. The next time I hear the work I shall try to do so with the relative blankness of mind that seems to come so easily to 'H. G.' and his friends, and if I find I then get as much pleasure as I always do out of either of Elgar's Symphonies (for that is the point) I will say so. For the moment (though I am quite aware I am opening up a big question and possibly, in a lesser measure, condemning certain other works, notably some by Strauss) I stand to my guns. But I would like to know the opinions of a good many other people. I would like to have a 'consensus of opinion' for or against 'P. A. S.' as compared with 'H. G.' I am not wrong, surely, in saying that the big public has never taken to 'Falstaff'; but how has that work impressed the general body of musicians?

On one matter I surely cannot be wrong—'Falstaff' is the most detailed 'programme' work ever composed. We have here the programme principle carried out in the most thorough way that anyone (short of the negligible authors of 'Battles of Prague' and the like) has ever dared to attempt. Indeed it is impossible to imagine that any composer can ever go a single step beyond it.

. . . . . .

Having completed my article and discussed 'H. G.'s' views and my own, it occurred to me to turn to my file and see what some of our colleagues say about 'Falstaff.'

Eric Blom, in 'Stepchildren of Music':

> 'But if it be a question of popularity, the virtues of his symphonic poem are precisely its most serious defects. It is like a vast canvas, tremendously effective when seen at a distance, but at the same time so full of interesting detail that we are continually tempted to approach so closely as to be no longer able to take in the general impression. We are then torn between the choice of following the work with the aid of a score in order to savour the whole of its masterly craftsmanship, and of enjoying the greater æsthetic satisfaction of penetrating into the manner in which the character of the pot-bellied knight is visualised. "Falstaff," unfortunately, seems doomed to unpopularity simply because it cannot be absorbed by any hearer at one performance, and because only a minority of music lovers will take the trouble of studying the work at the pianoforte or in the armchair, and of thus preparing themselves for a hearing by impressing the thematic material on their memory.'

A. J. Sheldon in the Birmingham Post, November 28, 1927:

> 'Towards an understanding of this portrait study in music the miniature full score on which the ordinary concert-goer must needs rely is not nearly so helpful as it might be. For though the plan of the work bears some relation to symphonic form the music is far from explained through its form. It is programmatic and allusive; we need a key to its programme and its allusions. Happily, though the miniature score does little towards informing us what was in the composer's mind when writing the music, Sir Edward himself, in an article appearing in the Musical Times of September, 1913, provided all the assistance a listener need desire. . . . The publishers would do well to arrange for its incorporation in future editions of the score.'

Ernest Newman in the Sunday Times, September, 1921:

> 'There is only one way to the full appreciation of it—to know it so well that every bar of it calls up the vision of the actor and the scene of the moment. In no other work of his does Elgar's imagination move with such rapidity. With an accompanying stage action the neatness with which every orchestral point is scored would be apparent at once. In the symphonic poem our audiences are used to a slower unfolding of just a single picture or two. The most crowded of the familiar canvases is "Till Eulenspiegel"; but even the changefulness of that is slow-footed in comparison with the mercurial nimbleness of "Falstaff."'

My conclusion, after this consultation with my brethren, is, I feel, a commonsense one: The man who has the time and energy should give the work a Newmanian study, with both the score and Elgar's Musical Times article before him and a wet towel round his head. The man who can't do this had better follow 'H. G.'s' advice and let all that wonderful wealth of literary and pictorial detail go hang. But I still feel with regret that a work that calls for either of these extreme treatments is doomed, despite all its beauties and its amazing felicities of characterisation, to remain for ever 'so far as public appreciation goes a comparative failure.' Sir Edward has heaped the camel of public comprehension to the last straw and broken the poor beast's back.

Some frank things were said about Chaliapin's Mephisto. The great man has now added to them. In the Sunday Dispatch of July 21 he said 'I am convinced that all the Mephistos before mine were rotten, and that mine is the same, the only difference being that maybe my predecessors were blinded by public enthusiasm and applause, whereas I am not.'

OPS. OR TITLES?

Some time ago (I forget where and when) I suggested that the time was coming when we should see the need for a Society for the Protection of Music.* Some recent developments show the necessity to be even more urgent than I had thought. For example, here is Mr. Sokoloff, the American conductor, with his 'dramatised symphonies.' His particular way of maltreating music is to add a 'choreographic interpretation.' He took his first step on the downward path last season, and has been allowed to go even farther this year. In April he 'interpreted' Strauss's 'Herod's Life' by the aid of a corps de ballet, and I gather from an American paper that he has a whole string of orchestral masterpieces marked down for similar treatment.

Such tinkering with great music is based on the two-fold fallacy that all the world and his wife must be brought to appreciate the classics, and that the process is helped by tacking on programmes, ballets, and other superficial attractions. But what ground have we for claiming that Everyman must be made an enthusiast for fine music any more than for fine literature or any other form of art? The fact of our finding it necessary to gild the musical pill with 'choreographic interpretations' and other lures, proves that we are trying to force it on to people who don't want it. Indeed, that the best music is a pill to such folk is sufficient evidence as to their unfitness for it. Why then should masterpieces have their bloom rubbed off by being dramatised or be-programmed or otherwise ill-used in order to enlist a few unwilling recruits? We don't try to popularise great literature or pictorial art by cheapening it save in the only laudable way—in price.

Let us spread the appreciation of classical music among the crowd by all means; but we must not forget that there never was a time when concessions to the less affluent and less educated were so little needed as they are to-day. A generation ago music was expensive to buy and both difficult and costly to hear. To-day cheap editions abound for would-be performers, and those who wish to hear the finest of music at the hands of the world's finest performers can do so by a process as simple as turning on the water supply—and at about the same cost per annum. Formerly the trouble was to bring the crowd and the music together. We had all sorts of elaborate methods of leading the horse to the water, and enthusiastic musical missionaries went into raptures when the shy animal pretended to drink. To-day, science brings the water to the horse for him to take or leave. If my neighbour switches on jazz and as resolutely switches off music, I may (and do) regret his choice, but I am not going to try to convert him by spinning pretty yarns and tacking them on to sonatas and symphonies. Still less (at my time of life) am I going to try to interpret them choreographically for his benefit. Musical propaganda, in fact, is in danger of going to undignified lengths. You may buy your convert at too big a price—not to yourself, but to the art.

I make no more than passing mention of the ballet—not because there is not much to be said, but because I doubt my ability to say it in language that will pass the editorial eye. I will therefore mildly refer to, and pooh-pooh, the fantastic idea that the posturings and contortions of an agile jackanapes can add to the significance of a piece of music. On the contrary, I assert, with steadily increasing mildness, that the ballet merely narrows down to one meaning (often a far-fetched one) a work that, left to itself, has almost as many meanings as it has listeners. It is a platitude, I know, but it needs to be insisted on to-day, that this variability enables music to leave every other art far behind. No chameleon ever changed its hues with the ease and frequency with which a piece of music changes its meaning. Even to the same player it may say something different on each day of the week, and in many instances—e.g., certain works of old composers where no pace is indicated—we may play it at all sorts of speeds with corresponding differences of signification. Then why rob music of this unique quality by tying it down to one interpretation? This is the main ground on which one may charge the ballet with being one of music's greatest enemies.

However, as I said above, I dare not trust myself to speak of the ballet. For the same reason I must pass by the cinema, with its musical hotch-potch made up of the disjecta membra of great musical works. A shade better is the restaurant, which does at least give us the music whole, though usually transcribed, and always degraded by being performed to an audience so busy with the flesh that the spirit has no chance. A good deal worse are the fox-trot compilers, despoiling the classics with their grimy paws.

Such crimes are to be expected from people who simply have no conception of the meaning and function of art. But what are we to say when music is wounded, or at least threatened, in the house of its friends? Is the expression too strong for the proposal of Mr. Compton Mackenzie (backed up all too readably by Mr. Percy Scholes in the current number of the Gramophone) that the classics should be popularised by being given fancy labels? Let it be granted that opus numbers make little appeal to the imagination (I say 'little' rather than 'no,' because some opus numbers do in fact make a considerable appeal. Personally, I always get an extra pinch of pleasure out of Schumann's 'Papillons' by remembering that it was his Opus 1; and I am sure that players of the first three Pianoforte Sonatas of Beethoven might find profitable reflection in the fact of their being marked 'Opus 2'). Mr. Scholes says:

* It is likely that in Germany such protection will be undertaken by the State, for the Prussian Academy of Arts and Sciences is collecting evidence in support of a law for the safeguarding of musical classics.

> 'This cold, statistical treatment is all that composers give to many of their loveliest creations. They deliberately suppress the individuality of their compositions. Look at the official opus numbers of Chopin, running to 73; of Mendelssohn, running to 121; of Schumann, running to 148; of Schubert, to 173; of Beethoven, to 256; of Johann Strauss, the elder, to 477.'

First, how is the individuality of a composition affected by its being numbered? On Mr. Scholes's own showing, the great majority of the finest things in music have numbers, but not names. Yet the 'cold statistical treatment' has not prevented them from winning a place in the heart of generations of musicians. On the other hand, the pieces of bad music that have achieved lasting popularity by means of a fancy title are comparatively few. Mr. Scholes goes on to say:

> 'Of course, musical compositions in addition to their numbers are often also described by their key, but that doesn't help. To the public it is merely something additional to try to remember—another bugbear. What a folly for a musical parent to dub his offspring, "Opus 51, No. 3, in B flat major," and then to think the man in the street will dote on it and write to the B.B.C. to ask for it again.'

But the man in the street usually has his Radio Times at hand, and in any case the work is described by the announcer before being played. Is the man in the street so lazy, or such a fool, that he cannot write down a key or a number as easily as a fancy title? I, for one, am getting very tired of the man in the street to whom arts and artists are supposed to salaam so abjectly. If his High Mightiness doesn't think good music is worth a little trouble, let him go without it. Hear Mr. Scholes again:

> 'A few professional musicians may talk opus numbers, but the general public never will.'

Only 'a few'? More, surely. A host of musicians, professional and amateur, can identify a great many works by their opus numbers. Then why be so solicitous for the general public? I repeat that a member of the herd who doesn't care enough for music to master a few technical terms and opus numbers should be left in his sloth and ignorance.

So far from objecting to opus numbers, I regret that the early composers didn't use them. There are many instrumental works by Bach and Handel, for example, that have to be nick-named (not in place of opus numbers, but because no opus numbers were used). So we have organists, for example, obliged to speak of the 'Great' G minor in order to distinguish it from numerous other preludes and fugues by Bach in the same key.

But let me end by pointing out a practical obstacle to the Compton Mackenzie-Percy Scholes scheme. In the paragraph quoted above, Mr. Scholes gives a few opus number totals. If you tot them up you will see they run to well over a thousand—1,248 to be exact. Add the works of composers not mentioned by Mr. Scholes and we shall have a total of some hundreds of thousands of pieces waiting labels. Let the labelling committee get to work forthwith; I wish them joy in their task. One advantage of numbers is that the supply can never run short. But titles! . . . Stephen Heller, you will recollect, compiled a set for Mendelssohn's 'Songs Without Words' (hardly any of which titles are now used, by the way, though Stephen was a fit and proper person to do the job). If he were alive to-day he would probably tell us that the labelling of even this little set of pieces was a stiff task. 'All went well,' he would say, 'for the first dozen or so, and there was no difficulty with such pieces as the "Bee's Wedding"—except that it might just as well be called "Spinning Song" (in fact, I even forget which title I used), but long before the end was reached I wished I had never started on the job. I see now that it was both unnecessary and presumptuous.'

Finally (really so this time), don't the labelling enthusiasts see that the attaching of titles to pieces of abstract music at once limits the appeal of the music in the way I have tried to show above? Mr. Compton Mackenzie made much of the fact that such titles as the 'Archduke,' the 'Rasoumovsky,' and the 'Waldstein' are accepted by musicians. True; they are accepted readily because they have reference to the origin of the pieces. They are not only convenient; they are also of historic interest. They suggest no programme or interpretation, and so they leave the music free. Some unwarranted, but generally accepted, titles do, I admit, hint at a programme—e.g., the 'Pathétique' and the 'Appassionata'—but they are exceptions, and they are tolerated because the consensus of musical opinion has decided that they fit. On the other hand, the great C major Sonata has been called the 'Aurora,' but practically all musicians prefer the much more prosaic but interesting and informative title the 'Waldstein.'

On practical no less than artistic grounds, then, the opus number wins the day; but the mere fact of these labelling suggestions having been made and sponsored by a leading amateur musician and a prominent critic shows that music is in constant danger of being saddled with unauthorised and narrowing titles and programmes.

Even Mr. W. W. Cobbett's 'Encyclopedic Survey of Chamber Music' contains a short article which gave me a shock, coming, as it did, from one whom I had always regarded as a champion of abstract music. The article is entitled 'Choreography — Its Alliance with Chamber Music.' Mr. Cobbett begins by saying that he had always fought an instinctive feeling that in all music, even in the most serious, there was a suggestion of bodily movement, of miming and the dance. He says that he was jealous of the intrusion of any conception of music other than the spiritual, but in the end he gave way, and is now convinced that music and the dance are indivisible. He proceeds to illustrate it by an account of a visit paid to him at his house by Ruth St. Denis, the famous dancer, who, after listening to Mr. Cobbett's quartet party, said, 'This splendid music surely lends itself to illustration by dancing and miming; it is "asking" for it.' Miss St. Denis was as bad as her word, for she had the carpet up forthwith and improvised a scene which I'm sorry to hear gives Mr. Cobbett 'much reminiscent joy.' Asking for the Andante from Dvorák's 'Nigger' Quartet, she tacked on and illustrated, ballet-wise, the following story:

> 'A geisha who had lost her lover visits the shrine erected over his burial place, and honours his memory in the only way she knows—by dancing before it; first of all with quiet dignity, and then, as the excitement of the music grows in intensity, with frenzied animation. During the final melodramatic bars she falls to the ground unconscious.'

(Think of the simple pathos of this movement, and ask yourself where the bereaved and distraught geisha comes in.)

Mr. Cobbett says that this little melodrama was illustrated in a manner so arresting that the quartet-players had difficulty in keeping their eyes from wandering in the direction of the dancer—which I can readily believe. That is the completest condemnation of such an interpretation. When I hear the Andante of the 'Nigger' Quartet played I want nothing to distract my mind from the music. Mr. Cobbett then leads on to an article from Mr. Leigh Henry, who begins by saying:

> 'To suggest union between dancing and chamber music is almost offensive to some. This is largely the result of stiff 19th-century convention, by which the intimate significance of chamber music has been forgotten.'

But what matters to us is not the 'original significance of chamber music,' but the importance of hearing the masterpieces in that form free from extra-musical associations and distractions. Happily, the account Mr. Leigh Henry gives of experiments with which he has been associated suggests that the amount of success attained is so modest that chamber music is safe yet awhile. But I repeat that Mr. Cobbett gave me a shock. What music is safe from the despoiling hand of the 'interpreter' after this? Clearly the time is ripe for a Crusade on Behalf of Music—just plain MUSIC with no nonsense about it.

We must start that Society!

PUBLIC SCHOOL MUSIC: A PRACTICAL VISIONARY

By A. E. F. Dickinson

The value of trained musical experience as a vital factor in the building up of human character is now generally established in educational circles, if we except those strongholds of conservative opinion which are still to be found in some corner of every public school, ancient or modern. It is less commonly understood how much music owes its honoured position in the educational world to the pioneer work of a few individuals at the turn of the century, as well as to the sound expansion of that work in the last twenty years by men more fortunate, perhaps, but none the less solely responsible.

The recent death of the Rev. A. H. Peppin, musical director at Mill Hill, Clifton, and Rugby, may serve as a reminder of the historical situation. Peppin was by no means the first man in his position to win a general respect for music in the school in which he was working. One of Thring's earliest ventures at Uppingham was the engagement of a music-master, and the entry into a public school of Herr David (so aptly named for the discomfiture of Philistines!) soon proved, once and for all, that music was a more than engaging school activity, capable in a unique way of developing the best qualities in those who had previously thought of it as an effeminate or abnormal pursuit. Although, however, David's all-conquering genius set a magnificent example to other schools and other musical directors, much remained to be done, and Peppin, appointed to Clifton in 1896, initiated certain vital schemes which every energetic and enlightened director now pursues as a matter of course, and formulated many other practical aims on such a sound basis, and with such far-reaching results, as to deserve some kind of record. He has written clearly and attractively on his general aims and methods, musical and educational, in his book

'Public Schools and their Music,' but a summarised account of his work may here be attempted.

In the first place, at a time when 'the music master' usually confined his activities to teaching a few boys the pianoforte and training the choir and orchestra (if any), Peppin joined forces with David in determining to bring the whole school into regular and vital contact with music. Always a practical visionary, he saw that stirring musical experience was within the reach of all, given suitable material and also (a significant educational point which David seems to have overlooked) a certain amount of systematic training in the assimilation of it; and he believed that this progress towards musical 'revelation' would, if properly conducted, awaken the imagination, invigorate the mind, and train the attention of all concerned. Having secured, then, the official approval of a concert by a professional orchestra, 'classical' but carefully varied in content, he gave four lectures on the music to be played, in which he endeavoured to prove, by apt comment and thorough illustration, that a hearty familiarity with the principal themes, and a plain understanding of their general development, so immensely added to the enjoyment of music as to place it in a new category of interest, for the musically untrained as well as for the more professional listener. The reception of the concert immediately justified the attempt. It 'stirred up' those who had never heard the like before; but for those in whom the lectures had already awakened a keen sense of anticipation, the thrill of full orchestral performance proved in many cases the beginning of a life-enjoyment of music. The scheme became an annual affair, and nowadays it is as widely practised in schools as it was experimental in 1901.

Then, Peppin became aware of much unfulfilled talent, latent in the numerous learners of instruments, and possibly in those who were not learning at all. He therefore instituted, first at Clifton and subsequently at Rugby, inter-house instrumental competitions, whose appeal to corporate work encouraged the diffident performer, stimulated the musically lazy, interested the 'non-musicians,' and, above all, induced many noble attempts at chamber music, and even house orchestras. The musical value of such competitions consists, in the end, in their capacity to raise the standard of individual performance, and in this connection the instrumental basis, under expert supervision of some kind, must be emphasised. An ensemble of necessarily untrained voices, such as school singing competitions produce, can never approach in real achievement a good string quartet movement, with all its hardly won individual accomplishment and as hardly won unanimity of performance.

The inducements to increased musical effort, which these competitions and the regular work of the school orchestra provided, were thus only inducements—the efficient, not the formal, cause. The only true basis of sound artistic endeavour was a high, and not too stationary, ideal of performance in the mind of all concerned, master or boy. And Peppin's systematic efforts to impress such a standard upon every learner deserve particular stress because there used commonly to be, and still partly survives, an idea that in a school it is hopeless to expect any musical standard from the untalented performer, unable to give more than an hour or two a week to his musical work. Peppin was one of the first directors to prove, by his personal supervision and careful organization, the entire falsity of such an attitude. Under him, the obligation to master a piece before it was 'left' was put before every boy who learnt music, and he himself kept a record of all pieces so mastered or abandoned; he also issued a comprehensive list of carefully graded pieces, which showed each boy the standard of the pieces he was learning and encouraged him to prove worthy of a higher-grade piece. Finally, Peppin's own pupils received an unusually sound and careful training. As against the view, already partly indicated, that there is no time at school for a thorough technical grounding, he maintained with almost unfailing success that the general foundations of tone-production were not difficult to lay down, and that in any case without tone-control nearly all real interpretation was impossible. He also developed sight-reading with remarkable effectiveness, by systematic attention.

Systematic attention, indeed, was the keynote of Peppin's work. Had it sprung from a love of system for system's sake it would neither have been attractive to those for whose immediate benefit it was exercised, nor remained an inspiration for his professional successors. But Peppin's unceasing efforts for public school music radiated from a reverent sympathy for the rising generation, which Youth greeted with willing and often affectionate co-operation and Experience will remember with a rare respect.

THE NEW MASTERSINGERS: A HOLIDAY EXPERIENCE

There is no doubt that they are a remarkable family.

We met for the first time by the old stone bridge that spans the Irt just below Wastwater. Scarcely had the formalities of introductions been concluded before I was plied with all sorts of questions.

'The key of C major is perfectly red, like a bus or a pillar-box, isn't it?' said the Mater.

'Well, perhaps so,' I answered, hedging. 'But don't you think it has also got something of grey in it, like granite, or, more nearly, like wonderful Norman columns, because of all its strength and immoveableness?'

Jean and Lorn, aged fourteen and ten respectively, were inclined to concede me my colour scheme, which restored my confidence somewhat.

Matters then went further.

'Which is the most sentimental key?' I asked.

There was a complete silence and some hard thinking.

'A flat?'

'What do you think, Lorn?'

Lorn replied that he agreed with me! This called forth loud protests from Mater and Jean. The former voted for D flat major for some reason which I cannot remember now; the latter for G major. So we were at variance again.

'Well, the mountains? What key do they suggest?' And we looked for help from Great Gable and the Screes and thought of Scafell round the corner.

'All keys,' replied Mater. 'E major near the water; something of E minor; there's also a D sharp somewhere—I think the key must be G sharp minor—and A minor at the top of them.'

On the truth of the last remark we all seemed agreed for once. I thought of Grieg and Norway, and was myself reassured in the general belief that A minor was not so very far out. The presence of the three 'white' notes in this triad carried my mind back to our conclusions on the C majorish quality of the Norman columns. It seemed right (to me) that the A minorish granite in its natural state should have been fashioned into the relative major at the hands of the masons of long ago.

Then Jean remarked that F sharp minor was the green of the sea, a statement we could not refute. I ventured on E flat major as perhaps the best key for noble human utterances. On this, however, there was again some difference of opinion, despite the examples I quoted from Beethoven, Wagner, and Strauss.

After a couple of miles' walk, mainly spent in arriving at inconclusions of this kind, we reached our small hotel at Nether Wasdale, to find Pater waiting for our return.

At the end of the evening meal, by way of Grace the family quartet suddenly and without warning broke into a five-fold—or it may have been a seven-fold—Amen, composed by Mater in the appropriate mountain-top key of A minor. I had already guessed, by the way, that the entire family must have possessed absolute pitch.

Lorn took the top part, Jean the alto, Mater (like Rosalind counterfeiting to be a man) became a counter-tenor for the occasion, whilst Pater took the bass line. The effect of it all was delightful and the pitch perfect.

The best criticism came from an old lady staying in the hotel, who, in response to an apology for the 'noise' created, said that 'it sounded like a cathedral!'

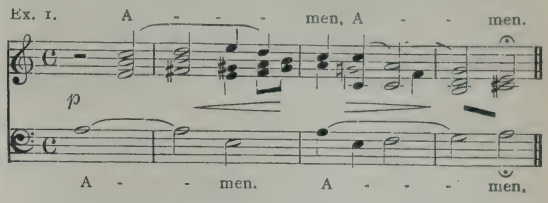
Naturally, imaginations were stirred by these events. So after dinner, and at the conclusion of a desperate card-game, 'chicken-food,' we fell to inventing some new 'Amens.'

These we called 'Modes,' and they all had to go to the word 'Amen' for the simple reason that (unlike the Mastersingers of old) skill in the art of making impromptu poetry was not a marked feature of our party.

[I suppose we felt 'modal' because there had been some talk on Dr. Herbert Thompson's informative and delightfully written book 'Wagner and Wagenseil.']

The first 'Amen' composed was promptly labelled 'After a Feast of Good Things,' being also called the 'Wasdale' or 'Festal' Mode:

Ex. 1.



It was rehearsed silently during lunch the next day—the various parts having been written out on old envelopes and other scraps of paper.

Then it was performed as a Grace after meat. Lorn was again treble, Jean alto, and their mother took her usual counter-tenor part.

Having been responsible for the writing of this Mode, I was invited to join Pater on the bass line. I ventured a suggestion or two on matters of detail, making an especial point of asking Mater to double Jean on the major third of the Tierce at the end, so that she (Mater), plus the two grown-up males, should not swamp Lorn and Jean on their low-pitched notes. This almost led to a quarrel, for my unfortunate suggestion provoked Jean to something like this:

'No, no, Mater; it's my Tierce, you know it is! Besides, it's not proper part-writing if you sing it as well. The root ought to be doubled.'

[N.B.—It already was.]

So the Tierce had to remain in Jean's safe keeping, and then we launched the Mode.

We had felt the night before that such a Mode demanded a companion. So we also created the 'After a Frugal Meal' Mode. Here it is:

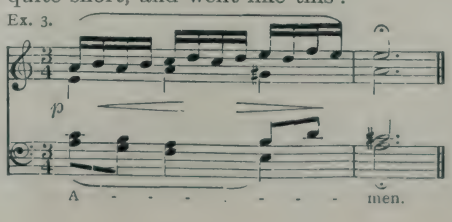
Ex. 2.

'My word,' said Lorn after we had sung it, 'it makes me feel jolly hungry.' He thereupon applied himself with zest to another helping of plum-tart. So we were compelled, in consequence of this flagrant disrespect to a Grace already sung, to go back at the very end of the meal to another performance of the Festal Mode proper. It was obvious at the time that the Frugal Mode would be sung very rarely!

The next day 'Modes' were very much in the air. They had become a pleasant plague.

In the afternoon we had gone, partly by road and partly by the 'toy' railway, to Eskdale, where we picnicked by the river. Over tea we invented still more Modes, or names for Modes, and sang one—the 'Babbling Brook' Mode. It was quite short, and went like this:

Ex. 3.



I put Jean, Lorn, and Aunt Peggy on the top line—firstly, so that the laughing-water effect should be sufficiently prominent, and secondly, because Lorn's small treble was not quite weighty enough for the quick-moving semiquavers.

Then somebody produced from I don't quite know where sufficient copies of Orlando Gibbons's eight-fold Amen in D (the one which I believe is sung at Westminster Abbey) to enable us to give a fairly good reading of its five-part polyphony.

Anyway, I swear the mountains nodded approval and the river sang more melodiously than ever, as if wishing to join in with an obbligato part.

Eventually we got back to Nether Wasdale to a sunset which applied itself to the landscape with colours of old gold, russet, and purple, as well as reddening the distant bracken to the fieriness of a poppy-field. But the mountain-tops were still pitched in the key of A minor, wreathed as they were in thin wisps of filmy cloud and giving a rare touch of completion to a scene of unforgettable loveliness.

Then we promised ourselves we would write a 'Russet Sunset' Mode, to be followed next day by the 'Mode of the Bunkered Tee-shot,' or (if wet) by that of the 'Chicken-food.' But we were so active enjoying ourselves in many other ways that I am afraid we seldom got further than the titles of most of the Modes.

One, however, is waiting to be written when justice can be done to it—the 'Mode of the Moonlighted Wastwater.' But we may have to wait a long time before it can be created in all its proper loveliness. The key of A minor is obviously too remote. Besides which, the children would argue very successfully that it was not usual to find mountain-tops at the water's edge.

. . . . . .

This is the tale of how we came to play at being the New Mastersingers on four days of a brief holiday in Lakeland.

KOBOLD.

ON THE SIMPLICITY OF SINGING

By William Shakespeare

Many of us have observed that every expression of the face is reflected in the sound of the voice, that it is impossible to portray happiness with the one and, at the same time, sorrow with the other.

Considered from the face downwards, the component parts of the voice are :

1. The facial expression.
2. The tone spaces in the mouth and throat.
3. The vocal cords in the 'Adam's apple.'
4. The pressure of the breath.

By the elusive art of the singer these components act as one harmonious whole.

The face is free for the expression of our emotions, richness is added to the tone, unerring precision to the tune, while, on the basis of a controlled breath, the sounds of the voice are started, sustained, and intensified.

The art may also be said to consist of two branches—the management of the instrument itself, and that of the power by which it is set in action.

The violinist learns to tune with one hand and (possibly of greater importance) has to acquire the use of the bow with the other. The pianist studies the fingering of both hands, but solves (only too slowly) the mysteries of touch—that sensitive expression in all that he fingers.

The vocal student encounters difficulties similar to those who study other instruments. He fails to start exactly on the pitch ; a cramped state of the throat interferes with the tone and pronunciation ; and the breath slips out in waste. He becomes confused by the problems of how to sing with freedom of throat, how to produce more voice, and yet retain mastery over the breath.

It has been found that on whispering some vowel —say 'Ah'—for a few seconds the throat feels much less cramped than during ordinary singing.

About the year 1880 a Prof. Donders, of Utrecht, Holland, noticed that the vowels, when quietly whispered, caused the air in the mouth and throat to resound at a different pitch.

We are indebted to Dr. William Aikin, of London, for having determined the exact pitch of every vowel, and for having arranged a sequence of the English vowels which, when correctly whispered, cause a musical scale to be distinctly heard.

It is certain that when a man sustains a whispered 'Ah,' and can tune this whisper to the note C (an octave above the third space, treble clef), he has found out the greatest resonance belonging to that vowel, and realises, moveover, a remarkable sense of open throat and a surprising freedom and unconsciousness of the tongue. Should the vowel tune down to B natural or B flat, or up to C sharp or D, his throat no longer feels as wide open, nor is his tongue so free and unconscious as when he tuned the whisper correctly.

The truth of this being indisputable, the following axioms seem to suggest themselves as worthy of careful consideration :

1. By correctly tuning a whispered vowel we realise the state of open throat and freedom of tongue which we seek to attain during singing.

2. The vocal cords being situated close to the base of the tongue, their natural action depends on the freedom of the tongue.

3. Freedom of throat and tongue sets up, in like freedom, the soft palate, the lips, face, and eyes.

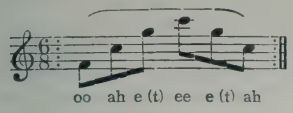
4. Throaty, gloomy, nasal, or 'silly' tones are incompatible with that state of throat by which we can correctly tune the vowels. The following whispered scale should be assiduously practised, singly, in twos or threes, then up the entire scale. The associated words contain the vowel sounds. The actual vowel sounds are disclosed by omitting the consonants. On account of their smaller mouth cavities, the corresponding whispers of women are tuned a minor third higher than those of men. Thus :

A man whispering	'who'	should sound	F,	a woman	A♭
,,	,,	'would'	,,	,,	F♯	,,	A♮
,,	,,	'know'	,,	,,	G	,,	B♭
,,	,,	'aught'	,,	,,	A	,,	C
,,	,,	'of'	,,	,,	B	,,	D
,,	,,	'art'	,,	,,	C	,,	E♭
,,	,,	'must'	,,	,,	D	,,	F
,,	,,	'learn'	,,	,,	E	,,	G
,,	,,	'and'	,,	,,	F	,,	A♭
,,	,,	'then'	,,	,,	G	,,	B♭
,,	,,	'take'	,,	,,	A	,,	C
,,	,,	'his'	,,	,,	B	,,	D
,,	,,	'ease'	,,	,,	C	,,	E♭

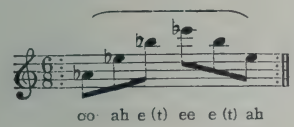
(The consonants not to be whispered.)

These whispered words form a sentence which may be memorised.

Another exercise may be whispered up and down in the same breath :
Men whisper—



two or three times in the same breath.
Women whisper—



two or three times in the same breath.

While practising the foregoing exercises it will be realised that a sense of ' open throat ' is the same thing as that of ' freedom of the tongue.' It must not be expected, however, that we can all at once sing with the same ease that we whisper. The vocal cords have to be tuned and set in vibration. This is at first a disturbing factor, because it draws our attention from the breath control.

At the risk of vain repetition I now point out the following, the truth of which experience seems only to emphasise more and more :

1. Although we can tune the whispered scale by adjusting the resonance chambers, we cannot tune the vocal scale by anything we can see or feel, as we have no direct command over the vocal cords.

2. All we can do is to decide upon a note, and on singing this to observe how near is the result to the sound we intended.

3. Now that is the right mechanism which causes the sound to start in the very ' eye ' of the note without our being conscious of having a throat. The correct action of the vocal cords is proved by the note starting exactly on the pitch we intended.

4. So, by alertness in listening, we gradually gain a mental conception of the mechanism which tunes the different notes with precision. (The influence on singing of languages which do not sustain the vowels is not considered here, for all singers must learn to sustain the vowels.)

Our first axiom may now read : By correctly tuning a whispered vowel we realise a state of open throat which we must now attain while SINGING.

Owing to the attachment of the vocal cords near the base of the tongue, the slightest rigidity of the latter during singing upsets the natural action of the vocal instrument.

On account of inexperience or awkwardness the rigid tongue can prevent accuracy of tune, purity of tone and pronunciation, natural facial expression, and a right control of the breath.

It is impossible to sing with a rigid tongue and at the same time with an open throat. One nullifies the other. Indeed, the art of singing lies in the avoidance of the one and the adoption of the other. A correct method of controlling the breath is the foundation of the entire edifice. On tuning a whisper we notice a sensation as of warming the breath. It must be the same during singing. Below the waist something seems pressing out the breath, while just above, and at the same time, it seems that something is holding back the breath. This double action causes a sense of struggle ; the hold back must not let the send out gain the mastery or the result is waste, but should the hold back overcome the send out we should be said to be ' holding the breath.' With every note correctly emitted, the breath-feeling and the freedom of throat should be precisely the same as during whispering. A good note never requires a greater pressure than, with experience, we can regulate.

With every good note the sensation of breath control is ' as though coming towards one,' and with the least rigidity the breath is felt to be pressed outwards, and only half-controlled. A bad note, by the displacement of the instrument, demands a pressure, greater than we can balance, as if ' warming.'

A good note, having the open state of throat, demands a breath-control underneath, or, lacking this, perishes for want of such control.

The sensation of the open throat is that of ' yawning,' while that of the breath is like ' warming.'

The usual procedure of practice in singing is to start single notes on ' Ah ' or ' Lah,' then two notes or more, scales, intervals, arpeggios, change of vowel, crescendo, all the exercises which suggest themselves to every good teacher. The notes of the scales gradually join themselves ' like pearls on a string ' (which is the breath). With further experience more tone and more character are acquired.

When practising, start ah, ah, ah, ah in the same breath. First take a silent breath, and plenty of it ; do not think of the note, but of tuning it. On failure to start the note exactly, try again a thousand times until you succeed, then prolong the sound. Do not think too much of the vowel, for as long as the tongue is free like yawning, the breath will adjust itself to the note, and the ' Ah ' will sound as it did when tuning the whisper.

As the voice acquires greater power, remember that greater pressure is necessary, and greater skill is required for singing such loud notes without stiffening the throat. Practise long notes by swelling from pp to ff and back to pp, and let the motto be ' never louder than lovely.'

Oft-repeated singing of loud notes is most fatiguing to the body, although nothing should be felt at the throat. In order to acquire this breath-pressure, an excellent device is to devote a few minutes daily to practising while extended on the couch. The awkwardness of holding up the chest or raising the shoulders when breathing in is at once realised, as well as the obvious advantage of silently breathing with enormous expansion at the waist.

The tuned whispers should be practised and now made to last out ten or fifteen seconds.

In this way the art is acquired of drawing in silently and suddenly enormous breaths, and of slowly pressing out the same for long phrases. Finally, we shall be equipped with a balanced breath-length which will never fail us, even should we eventually have to sustain with emotion the highest and loudest effects in grand opera.

STAGES IN THE HISTORY OF OPERA

I.—Claudio Monteverde

By J. A. Westrup

However the critical student may scoff at the historian's landmarks, protesting that a few outstanding trees are made to do duty for unbroken forest, it should be clear that to insist on the importance of individuals is not merely an arbitrary misinterpretation of the facts designed to make history easier to handle and remember. If anyone considers his own experience, he will readily recall that if he has ever been privileged to take part in any activity, however humble, which has rapidly developed into a continuous tradition, it was some unusually energetic or unusually gifted person who was mainly responsible for launching the movement. Not that launching a movement implies necessarily striking out into entirely new paths. Few are endowed with originality to the extent of being able to create something entirely new without any precedent whatever. Hence the plausibility of the widely-accepted theory that the great composer comes not at the beginning but at the end of an epoch, that he sums up all that has been said before, while providing a new starting-point for the numerous imitators who are bound to follow. Creative genius is nearly always dependent on what has gone before.

These few familiar generalisations may be helpful for a consideration of the importance of Monteverde, whose eccentricities have become better known to the average musician from the examples most frequently quoted than those more solid and enduring aspects of his genius which entitle him to the honoured place which he holds in the history of music. It is curious that until comparatively recent years he should have been celebrated mainly as the composer of 'Orfeo' and the one surviving fragment of 'Arianna,' so that his achievements in opera tended to obscure his work in other branches of composition. 'Orfeo' was regarded as the composer's most notable work, almost, in fact, as a unique example of his genius, and as one of the earliest examples of the practical use of orchestral effects. The discords and harmonic progressions were dug out of their context and exhibited to a bewildered public as evidence that Monteverde was really a very remarkable composer.

In all this there was a lack of a sense of proportion. Monteverde was already forty years old when 'Orfeo' was produced at Mantua in 1607, and had already published five books of madrigals. In writing 'Orfeo' he was striking out new paths only in so far as he himself was attempting a new form of composition, and doing it better than his predecessors. To understand this it is necessary to remember the foundations on which 'Orfeo' was built. The tendency of the Renaissance had been to emphasise the possibilities of secular as opposed to purely religious culture, and to draw inspiration from the art and literature of Greece, with which the Middle Ages had to a great extent lost touch. It was only natural that music and the drama should be affected by this change. At the same time it was impossible for it to escape entirely from the tradition of liturgical drama which was the undoubted forerunner of opera and oratorio. Into this outworn mould the Italians poured all that they considered most characteristic of the spirit and culture of Greece. Mythology was ransacked for suitable subjects, and the sensual and luxurious tastes of the petty oligarchs of the end of the 15th century were well adapted for the appreciation of all that was most suggestive in this attractive paganism. The City of God or the Heavenly Jerusalem was forsaken for the delights of the newly-discovered Arcadia, the seductive company of nymphs and satyrs, and the joys of Bacchus.

The story of Orpheus was particularly suitable for representation. As Mr. Henderson remarks with almost lyrical fervour,* 'he was the singer of the hymns that woke all Nature to life. For him the satyr capered and the coy nymph came bridling from her retreat, the woods became choral and the streams danced in the sunlight to the magic of his pipe.' Further, the story offers possibilities in the descent of Orpheus to Hades and his subsequent unsuccessful return, followed by his destruction at the hands of the Thracian Mænads. For these reasons the subject was not only adopted by the celebrated poet Poliziano (or Ambrogini, to give him his original name) in his 'Favola di Orfeo,' produced at the end of the 15th century, but also by the 17th-century opera composers, Peri, Caccini, Monteverde, and not a few of their successors.

The subject of Monteverde's 'Orfeo' is thus directly inherited from Greek mythology through the spectacular representations in the Courts of Italy in the 15th century. The only remarkable difference is that Orpheus is not torn to pieces by the devotees of Bacchus but translated to Heaven (wherever that may be in the scheme of things) by Apollo, in order to secure a happy ending. The foundations of the music are a little more complicated. The Florentine dilettanti who found in monody the solution of the problem of re-creating Greek drama and supplying an adequate musical setting to the written word would not have been able to discover what they wanted if there had not already been precedents for musical drama. It is impossible to know what was the nature of the music in Poliziano's 'Orfeo,' and it is quite likely that much of it was spoken, but it is probable that the songs were sung quite simply to a lute accompaniment. Much might have come from a natural development of this style, if the rise of the madrigal had not thrown the old secular monody into the shade and produced its own type of dramatic performance—the extraordinary and cumbrous madrigal-drama of which Vecchi's 'Amfiparnaso' is the best-known example. In this the words of the actors would be simultaneously sung by musicians behind the scenes with orchestral accompaniment, the upper voices generally singing the part of a female character and so on. But the madrigal having reached its height as a musical form underwent an inevitable disintegration, and rapidly became a solo with thorough-bass accompaniment. Many things had contributed to bring about this change, not least the popularity of transcriptions for solo voice and lute of compositions which had originally been written for several voices.

Italian musical art thus returned again to monody, which had not been lost—productions similar to Poliziano's were numerous in the 16th century—but rather swamped by the madrigal, which substituted for simple solos all the polyphonic apparatus of the skilled musician, the technique of the mass and the motet applied to secular subjects. Now, the figured bass opened to composers opportunities for free and expressive declamation, which would hardly have existed if the madrigal had continued to hold sway. And once free and expressive declamation is possible, the words take on a new significance, and purely personal passion can be expressed with all the resources of melody and harmony. True, it was the fashion to set the text of a madrigal so that individual expressions were appropriately interpreted—often with some naïveté—in the music, and there was even an attempt at reproducing the atmosphere of a poem. But this was nothing to the new freedom which allowed emotion to be translated by the diverse inflexions of a solo voice and by the changing harmonies of an accompaniment.

The importance of Monteverde is that he realised the possibilities of the new style. For Peri and Caccini it had meant essentially that they would be able to set each syllable to a note of appropriate length, and that the effect of the whole would be similar to the Greek drama as originally performed in the fifth and fourth centuries B.C. If they were prevented by instinctive musicianship from creating the dry and sterile productions which should have resulted from strict obedience to this theory, that was rather a matter of accident. They proclaimed the inanity of mere vocal ornamentation, but they were unable to avoid introducing much that must have been pleasing to the taste of the day. In their works we find not only restrained and not unexpressive examples of the new recitative, but also melodious passages in thirds of the kind which have tickled the Italian ear from quite early times. They were a characteristic of the popular villancico, and since opera owed not a little to early popular part-music, they naturally survived in the early experiments, and were employed with success by Monteverde, not only in 'Orfeo' but also in his madrigals and, more particularly, in his 'Scherzi musicali.'

This very brief sketch of the ancestry of Monteverde's 'Orfeo' should help to explain much that seems a little confusing when the work is heard for the first time. His recitative derives from the experiments of the Florentines, his choruses and concerted numbers develop out of the madrigal with continuo accompaniment, and he casts an eye also at the popular device of consecutive thirds. And behind these technical features is the whole history of the earlier musical drama, and behind that the great driving force of the Renaissance which made all these things possible. The diversity of style which appears in 'Orfeo' is more noticeable to-day than it would have been when it was first performed. The audience, an aristocratic and cultured audience, would have been familiar both with the madrigal style and the new recitative, and would have seen no incongruity in their association in a single work. With these tools ready to his hand and the skill to use them, Monteverde showed how far a composer of genius can transform dry theory into astounding practice and give new life to old tradition. That is, in short, why 'Orfeo' is a notable work. If we were merely anxious to celebrate the appearance of a new style, some other work anterior to it would have been chosen. Monteverde is a landmark precisely because his achievement made an unimportant thing important.

There is much more in 'Orfeo' than bold harmonies and lively rhythms. The beauty of the melodic line cannot fail to be a continual object of admiration, and the aptness of the harmonic commentary never ceases to delight. Abrupt chord sequences were not new, and there are parallels in Peri for the more daring progressions in 'Orfeo.' It is their appropriateness, dictated by the mind of a sensitive and thoughtful musician, that makes them significant and beautiful. Again, the composition of the orchestra of 'Orfeo' was no new and striking device. Combinations of instruments equally, as it seems, haphazard and strange, had been in use for years. The orchestra which played the intermezzi in Ariosto's 'Suppositi' (performed at the Vatican in 1518) consisted of fifes, bagpipes, cornets, viols, lutes, flute, and organ. But the idea which inspired the almost barbaric introductory toccata of 'Orfeo,' and the exquisite grace of many of the ritornelli for strings are peculiar to Monteverde.

The highly musical recitative of Monteverde developed further into the aria. He claimed that the music should arise out of the words, and it is significant that the poetry he set was generally of a high order—Rinuccini, Tasso, Busenello. In spite of the theories of the Florentines, he must have recognised that the musical expression of a situation is often better conveyed by the lyrical rapture of song than by the more formless lines of recitative. Freedom can defeat its own ends, and Monteverde discovered, particularly in the later operas, 'Il Ritorno d'Ulisse' and 'L'Incoronazione di Poppea,' the value of a formal musical framework. Here once again we observe how the possibilities of a new style are apt to become exhausted. Sooner or later development reaches its furthest point and proceeds to return on its own tracks. Thus recitative gives place to frequent lyrical movements, and from these in time arises the set aria which dominated later Italian opera.* In 'Orfeo' the use of song is practically confined to the earlier pastoral scenes. But Orpheus's triumphant outburst when Eurydice has been restored to him by Pluto is, though short, as much an aria as the more numerous examples which occur in the later operas. In these, Monteverde draws still further away from the Florentine model on which he had based 'Orfeo.' In 'Il Ritorno d'Ulisse' there are still traces of the earlier style, more especially in the instrumental introductions, but in 'L'Incoronazione di Poppea' his later style finds its complete expression. His songs, which have too often been neglected in favour of the purple patches in his earlier recitative, are as characteristic of the composer and contribute as much to his importance as those features of his style which have attracted more attention in the past.

'Orfeo' has often been praised in modern times, and if the pens of ardent enthusiasts have sometimes written down exaggerations which may afterwards be regretted, there can never be any harm in enthusiasm when the object is worthy of it. No one need, however, be convinced of the value of 'Orfeo' as a musical and dramatic work without the opportunity of seeing it performed. It is always a good thing when one has realised the historical significance of any work of art to be able to derive æsthetic pleasure from it. It is even possible to enjoy it without realising the historical significance. In either case both for those who have disproportioned ideas of the historical significance and for those who are completely ignorant of the work, a performance of 'Orfeo' is an interesting experience. For this reason it will be the first work to be performed in the Festival of Opera which is to be given at the Scala Theatre in London by professional singers and instrumentalists at the end of the year. This article is not to be regarded as an advertisement of that production, but quite simply as a means of recalling to those who have witnessed previous productions the pleasure which they derived from them, and of indicating to those who have not hitherto seen a performance that for many reasons the work is abundantly worth seeing. Subsequent articles will deal with the other operas which are to be presented at the same Festival.

* It is worth noting that, whereas 'Orfeo' was performed privately at Mantua, both 'Il Ritorno d'Ulisse' and 'Poppea' were performed in the new public theatres of Venice.

THE RIGHTS OF AUTHORS AND COMPOSERS: NEW LEGISLATION IN RUSSIA.

In various ways the Soviet Government of Russia is taking steps to protect and encourage all forms of culture. This attitude of paternalism has its dangers, and in certain directions might become tyrannical, but from the severest of critics of certain aspects of the present regime there can be nothing but praise for the way in which the present Government is giving care and attention to the interests of musicians, authors, and artists.

Authors and composers in Russia have reason to be grateful for new legislation which has recently come into force, which in various important aspects strengthens their rights.

Under the new law the rights of authors and composers are identified with those of employed labour. Hitherto, if a publisher went bankrupt, all his employees were paid off first from any of the realised assets, and the unfortunate authors had to queue up with the remaining creditors, who generally found that there was nothing left after the prior claims had been satisfied. Authors, artists, and composers will now have a first claim in the case of failure of a publisher.

To give authors and composers fuller remuneration for their work, the new law limits the free use of literary, musical, and art works which formerly could without fee be reproduced by a third party without the consent of the author. In view of the many and increasing methods for the mechanical mass reproduction of creative work, this change is of great importance, and enables creative workers to obtain their full share of the rewards made possible by recent advances in inventive science.

Authors in Russia have claimed that they should receive royalties on the translations of their works into other languages, but in view of the fact that so many languages are spoken in Russia, and that therefore translation facilities need to be encouraged for the spread of a common culture, especially among the small minorities which have lived under conditions of political and cultural oppression, the Russian Government has decided that for the present it cannot acknowledge the exclusive right of the author to the translation of his works.

Authors and composers of unpublished dramatic and musical works retain their rights under the new law. An author under the law of 1925 had no right to prohibit the public performance of published works which had been performed, if only once, and even when the work was only in manuscript. But he had the right to an author's fee, unless admission was free to the performance. The old law guaranteed the rights of composers to a fee for the public performance of their musical compositions only when the works were marked, 'Rights of the composer reserved.' The new law removes this limitation, and provides that the fee shall be given in all circumstances.

Considerable changes have been made in the time-table of authors' rights. Authors' rights to literary and musical works are life-long, with an addition of fifteen years to their heirs.

An important innovation for Russian authors and composers is the fixing by the State of standard terms of contracts with publishers. There previously had been considerable grievance since the Revolution, as at one time State publishers were in a position to dictate almost any terms to the author. The Government has now made provision for the safeguarding of the interests of authors, and for providing better pay and better conditions. The procedure is similar to that adopted in the protection of other forms of labour. Each contract must contain provision for a time limit and a minimum fee according to the size of the edition.

THE SPIRIT OF THE AGE

By Arthur T. Froggatt

Reading the report of an address delivered by one of our talented young composers in the town in which he resides, a short time ago, I was rather amused to find that he apologised for, or perhaps I ought to say justified, the extraordinary characteristics of much of our modern music, by saying that they reflected the confusion which the great war had generated in every department of human thought and life. I do not remember his exact words, but I believe the above fairly conveys their import. That is to say, the music of to-day expresses the life of to-day, having its genesis in the spirit of the age. When life is humdrum, art is humdrum; when the pools are stagnant, art is stagnant; when the waters become agitated, the arts grow turbulent; when the vox populi attains to incoherence, music follows suit.

I have said that this explanation of an undoubted fact rather amused me. Why? Because I think it gives the case away most completely. On the present occasion I am concerned only with music; but if this were the appropriate place, and I had sufficient space for the attempt, I should hope to be able to prove that in all the fine arts it is only mediocrity which reflects the spirit of the age, and that genius aims at something higher and far better. The spirit of the age is commonly trivial, often decidedly bad; and always material, of the earth, earthy. The function of art is to divert the mind of man from that which is merely material, and to lead it to the contemplation of something more ethereal; and art which fails to do this is degraded and debased. The mission of art to the soul (ψυχή) is similar to that of Christianity to the spirit (πνεῦμα) of man, namely, to uplift; and, therefore, has little or nothing in common with the spirit of the age. But the man of mediocre talent, who is destitute of inspiration, who has no message for mankind, but nevertheless desires to dabble in art, finds only two courses open to him: either he must content himself with producing a pale reflection of what others have done before, or else he must yield himself to the spirit of the time, and swim with the tide. There are, of course, exceptions to every rule, but I believe it to be true that art, in its highest manifestations, like religion, is almost invariably opposed to the general tendency of human conduct.

The 16th century was a time of upheaval. From various causes, foreign to our subject, the authority of the Church, the oldest institution in Europe, was called in question. The greatest revolution which Europe had seen since the overthrow of the Western Empire was the consequence. And many other changes were imminent. A new world had been discovered; the literature of ancient Greece had established itself in the universities of the Occident; and the great movement of the Renaissance, mainly pagan in character, had become an accomplished fact. The current of human thought and feeling was diverted into various unexplored channels. How did these things affect the great musicians of the century? Take four of the greatest, from as many different nations: Palestrina (1514-94), Orlando di Lasso (1520-94), Vittoria (1540-1603), and Byrd (1542-1623). What do we find in their works? Nothing revolutionary, nothing that is not a legitimate development of ideas which appear to have originated in the Old French school about the close of the 11th century, expanded and handed down through the intervening generations by such men as Dufay, Okeghem, and Josquin de Près. And most of the music composed by the 16th-century masters is written for the Church. Even their secular works, whether vocal or instrumental, reflect nothing of the restless spirit of the age.

The first half of the 18th century was not a period, one would suppose, in which high artistic ideals would be likely to be realised. An absence of enthusiasm, extreme artificiality, indifference to or contempt for religion, and a general worship of materialism were among its most striking characteristics. Frederick the Second, called the Great, the disciple of Voltaire, one of the ablest and most unprincipled men that ever wore a crown, may well be taken for its representative. And there were many musicians then flourishing—their works, if not their names, long since forgotten—who faithfully reflected the spirit of the age. But there was one who followed a less remunerative line of conduct. The 'St. John' Passion, the 'St. Matthew' Passion, the B minor Mass, and the Christmas Oratorio have nothing in common with their century. Like St. Paul, they were 'born out of due time.' As Emil Naumann well puts it, 'Bach represents the completion and perfection of Catholic and Christian tonal art-development during the Middle Ages and the epoch of the Reformation.' In what was possibly the most worldly of all past centuries (of course, I am referring only to the Christian era), we hail the appearance of the most sublime sacred music ever written. No greater contrast between the genius of a man and the spirit of the age in which he lived could be conceived. As Gumprecht has said, 'If ever a man served his art for the love of God, truly it was John Sebastian Bach.'

The first half of the 18th century was a time of trouble and anxiety for this country. A foreign dynasty on the throne, disturbance in Ireland, two rebellions in Scotland, the South Sea Bubble, wars with France and Spain, the suppression of convocation, and a general indifference to religion combine to make anything but an attractive picture. Yet we find nothing of all this turmoil reflected in the music of our most eminent composers, such as Weldon, Croft, Greene, and Travers. Moreover, it was in 1741 that the noblest piece of sacred music ever written in England was penned. There is very little of the spirit of the age in 'The Messiah'! That spirit is undoubtedly felt in Handel's operas, and in some of his instrumental works; but scarcely at all in the compositions by which he is chiefly remembered.

The second half of the 18th century saw the dawn of modern music. The long train of Haydn's String Quartets commenced in 1755, and the still longer train of his Symphonies in 1759. The regeneration of the opera was inaugurated by Gluck with 'Orfeo' in 1762. Mozart's career as a composer, in full brilliance, may be said to commence early in 1778, when the beautiful Sonata in A minor was written.

Men's minds during this period were, no doubt, beginning to assimilate new ideas, largely owing to the work of the French encyclopædists; but these three musicians, by far the greatest of their time, were well in the forefront. A few thinkers, like Arthur Young, discerned the indications of the coming storm, but the Revolution was still in the distance. If any real connection can be established between the life-work of these three and the upheaval of the French Revolution, it cannot be maintained for a moment that the former was inspired by the latter. As regards Gluck, his last operas were produced in 1779, ten years before the eventful meeting of the States General. Mozart, it is true, died during the time of the Revolution, and Haydn lived to see the end of it, but it may safely be said that it made no difference to the creative work of either. I suppose the most terrible deeds of Mozart were, firstly, the two false relations in the Adagio of the String Quartet in C (K. 465), and secondly, the augmented octave in the Overture to 'Don Giovanni'; and as the Quartet was written in 1785 and the opera in 1787, the crimes of the Girondists and Jacobins cannot have been the remote cause of either. Nor do I think that dear old father Haydn showed much partiality for revolutionary ideas, unless the introduction of clarinets into his later works may be so regarded.

And what of Beethoven? Unlike the great three mentioned above, Beethoven was not an explorer of new paths. On the contrary, it was his mission, in the domain of instrumental music, to continue the work of Haydn and Mozart, raising it to such heights as no other has ever attained, or (I believe) ever will attain. No great artist was ever less inspired by the events of the time in which he lived than was Beethoven.

With the exception of a few vocal pieces, his only composition of this kind was 'Wellington's Victory,' written to celebrate the battle of Vittoria, and generally regarded as his worst effort. He certainly intended to dedicate the 'Heroic Symphony' to Napoleon, but soon changed his mind, tore out the page on which the name was written, and in the end dedicated the work to Prince von Lobkowitz.

Whether there was a psychological relationship between the new ideas of Gluck and Haydn, and the novel theories which eventuated in the French Revolution, is a question which I do not propose to discuss at the present moment. But undoubtedly the operas of Richard Wagner must be taken as among the many signs of the sudden rise of a new German Empire. Here, again, it is to be observed that the music which was to dominate Europe for so many years did not derive its inspiration from the German hegemony of the nations; it manifestly could not do so, for it preceded it by several years. The new German Empire, Bismarck's Germany, was the result of three successful wars, waged by Prussia against Denmark, Austria, and France respectively.

Now, 'The Flying Dutchman' was written in 1841, and produced in 1843; 'Tannhäuser' was completed and performed in 1845; 'Lohengrin' was completed in 1848 and performed in 1850; 'The Rhinegold' was completed in 1854, 'The Valkyre' in 1856, and 'Tristan and Isolde' in 1859. The war between Austria and Prussia on the one hand and Denmark on the other occurred in 1864—a mere preliminary to what was to follow. 'Siegfried' and 'The Mastersingers' were commenced some years before that war; so also were the first sketches of 'The Dusk of the Gods' and 'Parsifal.' The war between Prussia and nearly all the other States of the Germanic Confederation took place in 1866: 'The Mastersingers' was performed in 1868. And, finally, in 1870, came the war between France and Prussia.

There is one remarkable parallel existing between the Wagnerian operas and the empire so laboriously established by Bismarck, namely, very considerable cuts have been made in the operas and also in the Empire. Whether these cuts will ever be restored I will not venture to prophesy. I will only say that I would rather see them replaced in the operas than restored to the Empire. But I venture to hope that I have been able to prove the position which I set out to substantiate: that the highest musical genius has never been inspired by passing events; that, on the contrary, it has found its inspiration in crowning the past or else in heralding the future.

SYMPHONIES AND THE ORDINARY MAN

By Hervey Elwes

In Mr. Galsworthy's delightful novel 'The White Monkey,' written some seven or eight years ago, Michael Mont, referring to his contention that the public at that time were not nearly so emancipated as the members of his own set seemed to think, says to his wife, 'D'you know, only one hundred and fifty thousand people in this country have ever heard a Beethoven Symphony? How many, do you suppose, think old B. a back number? Five thousand, perhaps, out of forty-two millions. How's that for emancipation?'

Where Michael Mont (and Mr. Galsworthy) got these figures from I don't know. One thing, however, that's quite certain is that the musical emancipation of the masses has become much more general during the last few years. Since a wireless pole began to form a somewhat disturbing feature of nearly every back garden, thousands of people must have listened, with pleasure or otherwise according to their individual temperaments, to quite a number of symphonies. How often these people will have to hear the symphonies of Beethoven before they 'think old B. a back number' is an interesting question.

Some of the professional critics have already reached that stage. One of them said recently, he wished the fifth Symphony might never be performed again. But the ordinary, musically-inclined man is likely to regard the prospect of hearing the fifth Symphony much in the same way as did Barbellion, the author of 'The Journal of a Disappointed Man.' And he will probably consider it a matter for additional rejoicing if, as in Barbellion's case, the seventh Symphony is also in the programme.

'Before the concert began I was in a fever,' wrote Barbellion. 'I kept on saying to myself, "I am going to hear the fifth and seventh Symphonies." I regarded myself with the most ridiculous self-adulation—I smoothed and purred over myself—a great contented tabby cat; and all because I was so splendidly fortunate as to be about to hear Beethoven's fifth and seventh Symphonies.'

Anyone who sets out to hear a symphony or two in that frame of mind is bound to gain happiness from the experience; and 'the days that make us happy make us wise,' as Mr. John Masefield says. At the time of writing, even I am feeling just a little wiser than I did yesterday, because last night I was 'so splendidly fortunate' as to hear three symphonies!

It is true, I could not go to Queen's Hall, to listen to and to watch the Hallé Orchestra playing the 'Unfinished' of Schubert, Beethoven's seventh Symphony, and Brahms's fourth. But as the music came through to me in my own room, it was a sheer delight! One wondered, however, why the 'Brahms' was put last. It seemed a little too much like having the joint brought on at dinner after all the lighter courses had been consumed.

The younger generation of to-day are to be envied because of the chances of happiness they will have in the future in hearing much symphonic music by really fine, permanent orchestras. And now that it is no longer the custom, wherever young people are gathered together, to regard musicians as, necessarily, niminy-piminy nonentities, there is rapidly developing in the minds of many boys and girls a distinct tendency to listen with intelligent interest to good music, and to enjoy it—if they can.

I had a letter the other day from a public school-boy—a quite normal boy, with a wholesome sense of humour and a strong liking for any form of diversion that takes him out-of-doors. During his earlier years he received little encouragement to cultivate a taste for music. But a sympathetic housemaster has now provided both the encouragement and the opportunity. This is shown in the following extract from the boy's letter:

'Mr. —— has recently taken to letting us play his gramophone practically whenever we want to. It is even more enjoyable than you would suppose, for he has a beautiful gramophone, and lots of records of the big classical works—not merely extracts, but complete, in albums. He has all Beethoven's Symphonies, which I like better than anything. Mozart's String Quartets and Symphonies come next with me, I think. They seem to me the most tuneful things I have ever heard.'

In a comparatively short time this boy will become a business man—a very ordinary man, probably, where music is concerned. Yet he will certainly be one of those people who, though they may have little inside knowledge of the world of music, are nevertheless well worth the consideration of all those who compose music and of those who perform it.

A man may hardly have drawn a line since the scribbling days of his boyhood. But, if he has a taste for art, he will intensely enjoy studying the works of the older and the newer schools of painting. The fact that he has only the haziest idea of how the artists get their effects in the various mediums in which they work does not prevent the non-expert from gaining an immense amount of pleasure from all sorts of pictorial art —provided it is good of its kind.

In the same way, anyone with a feeling for music can, and frequently does, obtain not only pleasure but mental stimulus from symphonic music, though he may know nothing about the technical construction of the works he hears. If, for instance, a superior person tells him that Schubert's last Symphony is not altogether satisfactory—partly because, instead of being content with a few tunes and developing them in various ways, Schubert strung a number of tunes together, and partly because the work is so long —the ordinary man will probably reply that he thoroughly enjoys Schubert's torrent of delightful tunes; and as to length—well, this symphony does not seem to him nearly as long as some much shorter works by those modern composers who meander so aimlessly that they become bores after about five minutes.

That playful cynic, Mr. Bernard Shaw, once said, 'Hell is full of musical amateurs.' One hopes this is an exaggeration! There must, however, surely be some intermediate stage, where musical amateurs (and, of course, amateur critics) will be given a certain amount of disciplinary training before they are allowed to come in any way in contact with the Choir Invisible. And what about the professional critics? Even in their exalted ranks there are some who, sooner or later, ought to receive a little mild chastening.

Many readers will remember with what an outburst of enthusiasm Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony was greeted when first it was performed. But, after hearing it often enough to stale its emotional appeal, the critics changed their minds; and during recent years we have frequently been informed that the tragedy and the pathos which seems so impressive to those who hear the work for the first, or even for the second time, is no more pathetic or tragic than a child afraid of the dark, or a man suffering from a fit of the spleen. In fact, the critics appear to be rather surprised that, as they have now labelled the thing 'blurb,' any orchestra should have the temerity to keep it in its répertoire.

But they should remember that even under present conditions of musical emancipation there are still a large number of people who have never yet heard the 'Pathetic' Symphony. At a first acquaintance, it may be, this symphony will sound just as pathetic to these people as it did to the critics of some twenty years ago: although, as a result of the war years, there is a healthy tendency nowadays to keep sentiment and sentimentality well apart.

To the ordinary man art is art, and life is life. When he visits a theatre he may be deeply moved by a tragedy, or greatly entertained by a comedy. But he doesn't think it inevitable that the author of the former lived (or is living) in a state of constant gloom; or that the writer of the comedy must needs be one of those tiresome fellows who are always merry and bright at breakfast time.

The modern mania for prying around among the less savoury details, moral and physical, in the lives of the great composers is no doubt perfectly justifiable if the object of the search is mainly historical. For it is, of course, absurd, as well as misleading, to write a 'life' of anyone, whether he is a musician or a muffin-man, and gloss over, or altogether omit to refer to, certain faults of temperament and bodily and mental infirmities which were only too painfully obvious to those who had anything to do with the subject of one's study. The ordinary man, however, prefers to listen to music as a series of sounds rather than as a series of symptoms. He refuses to use one ear, so to speak, to take in the beauties of the music, and the other to listen for anything in the work being performed which may suggest the composer was in the habit of beating his wife, or that he suffered from housemaid's knee.

The happiest music-lover is he who regards music as a sanctuary—a way of retreat from what a child once described as the 'hussell and bussell' of every-day life. This feeling is exquisitely expressed by Mr. de la Mare in the first two lines of his poem, 'Music':

'When music sounds, gone is the earth I know,
And all her lovely things even lovelier grow.'

THE FOLK-SONG MOVEMENT

By Robert H. Hull

It appears that the more extravagant phases of the folk-song revival in England are now at an end, and in that event it may be possible to estimate the gains and losses of the movement with greater impartiality than one could reasonably expect when the controversy was at its height.

The subject of this controversy has been, curiously, not so much folk-music itself as the means by which it has been exploited. On this point there is ground for a common grievance. Whether or no one commends the wholesale revival of music, some of which through sheer dullness and poverty is probably better forgotten, there would be general agreement, one imagines, as to the reprehensibility of employing folk-music as a sort of illegitimate bait for enterprises whose connection with music is fairly remote. There is community singing, for instance. Apart from those of its exponents whose musical standing is beyond question, there have been others whose concern has been advertisement pure and simple. The unlucky folk-song is dragged in as an enticement to the public and as an official chaperone for any revived war-songs or hymns which may appear in the same programme. The proceedings, thus camouflaged, are allowed to continue without fear of interruption.

This may sound like the worst form of musical snobbery, but nothing could be further from the writer's intention. If the folk-song deserves something better than a public mauling it is not, on the other hand, of a nature so rare and precious as to justify its being surrounded by an atmosphere of refined pseudo-art. Such, only too often, is its misfortune.

We have in this country Leagues and Societies whose avowed aim is to perform folk-music and folk-dances. One could not reasonably quarrel with the intention did not its practical translation frequently provoke the critic to expostulate. In the matter of folk-songs alone, the performance is often vested with a significance and mysterious importance which a much more elaborate production would scarcely justify. The label 'folk-song' is regarded as a talisman capable of sustaining any attack. It seems to be, in some cases, literally a matter of luck whether the tunes are of the first or the worst order. This bran-tub system is by no means uncommon. Where discrimination should be most vital it is, more often, entirely lacking. One hears the same complaint in connection with the music revived and performed at the Haslemere Festivals. The examples are in some respects parallel. In both cases the result is that poor and worthless music severely handicaps, simply through juxtaposition, other works which may be excellent. The possibilities of this misfortune are too obvious to require further comment.

A less tangible though more serious result of the movement has been the incorporation of folk-tunes into the considered works of some of the leading composers of this country. That the tendency is widespread is beyond dispute. The defence has been put forward that the idiom of certain composers is of so 'national' a character that this adoption—to put it mildly—of folk-tunes is to be regarded in their case as legitimate. This argument scarcely carries conviction. Elgar, to mention one example only, is in his finest achievements unmistakably 'national' in the best sense, but his reputation does not rest upon acquired or artificial melody. Nor, it may be suggested, does the best work of Vaughan Williams. There is, however, this difference. In the case of Elgar the individuality is a certainty; with Vaughan Williams it may become an accident. Any student with a moderate inventive ability can write synthetic folk-music literally by the yard; its creation does not require abnormal intelligence. Vaughan Williams and Holst may be to some extent the victims of circumstances in the media which they employ, but their choice of means and, above all, the method of its employment, must necessarily cause the critic to view their endeavours with apprehension.

It would be futile to deny that there are recorded instances of folk-song employed in such a manner that the excellence of the craftmanship may excuse the adoption. Delius's 'On hearing the first cuckoo in Spring,' based on a Norwegian folk-song, is one example; 'Brigg Fair' is another. But for one composer who succeeds many others fail, and one would not care to justify the method as a general principle. It may be that I am over-estimating the dangers likely to arise from this dependence. Alternatively, it seems a matter for concern that there is, in the present music of this country, a marked tendency to economise original thought. Fortunately there are still a number of composers, many of them young, who are as yet untouched by the influence. It is to them that one must look for any chances that may remain for a Renaissance.

One would emphasise that in respect to the finest folk-music of this country there is no praise too high. It is difficult to exaggerate the value of the scholarly research which has brought so much of this music into prominence. The complaint against the movement is, however, two-fold. In the first place there is little attempt at differentiation between what is first-rate and what is undisputably worthless; secondly, folk-music, admirable as it may be in its proper context, has been exalted to a position which it was never intended to occupy, or, as in some cases, misused in a fashion which may well have caused the pioneers of the movement to turn in their graves. It may be only a matter of time before the present exponents recover their sense of proportion. There are signs that this is the case. Meanwhile our concern is that they should not leave too unsightly a mark upon the music of this country as a memorial to their less controlled activities.

Gramophone Notes

By 'Discus'

H.M.V.

It was with some trepidation that I put on the records of the Philadelphia Orchestra playing Beethoven's seventh Symphony, conducted by Stokowski. (These crack American orchestras too often underline for my taste.) Having got to the end of this set, score in hand, I am glad to be able to give it almost undiluted praise. I do not see eye to eye with Stokowski in the matter of pace, however. I feel certain that he makes the Trio of the Scherzo too deliberate—a definitely slow rate instead of the meno presto marked by the composer. And he is inclined to slacken the pace at quiet passages. This is a temptation to which almost all conductors succumb. Perhaps they won't plead guilty; probably they will defend themselves with that blessed word 'interpretation.' But when the composer has ensured all the contrast that is necessary by reducing power and by writing a theme which, being in notes of greater value, already gives an effect of reduced pace, I can never see why it is necessary to rallentando as well, especially when the composer expresses no desire for such a slowing up. Beethoven, we know, was very careful in all his indications, and if he wanted a rallentando we may be sure he would have marked it. Apparently the time is approaching when a composer will have to take preventive measures, and sprinkle his pages (especially points where quiet subjects are concerned) with the direction non rall. In saying this I do not, of course, press for too rigid a following of the copy; but when we find, as we do, nine conductors out of ten (even the most famous), and a similar proportion of instrumental soloists, guilty of such an obvious fault, it is time to protest.

LONDON: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, LIMITED.

In regard to power there is not much ground for complaint in this performance. We could do with a little more soft playing—especially in the slow movement, where the scaling is generally too high. Some of it has the effect of a triumphal march, and in one or two places the absence of pp and p interferes with the grading up to f and ff. In the Finale, where Beethoven calls for fff (one of the few occasions on which he used this mark, and therefore a point of which much should be made), there is, as usual, practically no difference between the ff and fff. I am always surprised that conductors do not somehow manage to keep a little power up their sleeve to bring out at these climaxes.

The good points of this performance are many. I do not recall a hearing that has given me a fuller realisation of the rightness of Wagner's label of this Symphony as 'the apotheosis of the dance.' From start to finish it is tremendously alive. The Scherzo, barring the matter of pace in the Trio, is tip-top. For spirit and clarity it could hardly be beaten. In the Finale for once in a way we hear the theme of the strings. In most performances, at first hand and by gramophone alike, the actual subject of the movement is allowed to be drowned by the brass. The brass parts in this Finale are in fact amongst the ugliest in all Beethoven. In this performance one is unconscious of the defect. (The trouble of course was not due to Beethoven, but to the limitations of the instruments; it is left for conductors to ameliorate the fault.)

The best tribute I can pay this recording is to say that I have rarely enjoyed the Symphony so much; so stimulating was the playing that in the necessary journeys to and from the gramophone to change the records I almost skipped my way. I ought to add that the tone of the strings is, as usual, over keen. We expect this as one of the prices we pay for electrical recording, but we should pay only under protest. Too complacent an acceptance of a very real defect will encourage the companies to be content with what is, after all, a distortion. We must keep pegging away until the string tone is as faithfully reproduced as that of the wood-wind. (By the way, in the middle of the Finale something has gone wrong with the recording for a few seconds. I have tried it again and again without being able to discover the cause of the trouble, but there is a bad mix-up for about two revolutions. It may, of course, be peculiar to my sample, but I mention it in case it is not.) (D1639, 1640-43).

Those who like the Gluck-Mottl Ballet Suite (I don't) will enjoy it as recorded with the Berlin State Opera Orchestra playing, conducted by Blech (D1529).

It is pleasant to find Kreisler playing something worth recording. Here he is with Rachmaninov as partner in Grieg's Violin and Pianoforte Sonata in C minor. The honours go to the violinist. In a perfect performance of a duet Sonata they should be shared exactly. I do not like Rachmaninov's pianoforte tone, and too often he allows the violin part to be over-prominent. Nevertheless, there is much that is enjoyable in the performance. The C minor is perhaps the least lyrical of the three sonatas of Grieg. Nevertheless, it has its lyrical moments, and I feel that these might be made more of. The performance strikes me as being too consistently strenuous (DB1259-61).

There are a couple of good pianoforte records. Paderewski is heard in a couple of old friends very much alike in character—Chopin's Valse Brillante, Op. 18, and Rubinstein's Valse Caprice. The vitality and power here more than make up for some tone that, as usual with Paderewski, is but so-so (DB1273).

Far more interesting on the musical side, and excellent both in playing and reproduction, is the record of Moisiewitsch in Brahms's E flat Rhapsody and Ravel's 'Jeux d'eau' (D1648).

An organ record above the average is that of G. D. Cunningham playing, at St. Margaret's, Westminster, a Bourrée of Handel and Gigout's Scherzo in E. The Handel becomes a little monotonous by the time the end is reached (Handel's fault—too much repetition). The Gigout piece is capitally touched off; the registration is well chosen, and the lively pace is achieved without muddle (C1650).

I suppose the star turn among vocal records this month will be that of Rosa Ponselle in 'Casta Diva.' I can't get up much enthusiasm; the music is uninteresting. There is no mistaking the excellence of the singer, but it is a pity the soft effect on the first side gives one an impression of remoteness (or as if the tone were enclosed in a swell-box) rather than actual soft singing. (This defect is perhaps peculiar to my sample.) The performance is with the Metropolitan Opera House and Chorus, conducted by Setti (BD1280).

Rudolf Bockelmann is a baritone whose voice takes one captive immediately. He is recorded in the Toreador's song from 'Carmen' and the Mirror Song from 'Tales of Hoffmann,' with the Berlin State Opera House Orchestra, conducted by Clemens Schmalstich. His rich, well-coloured tone makes one almost forget the oddity of hearing the familiar 'Toreador' sung in German (C1680).

It is a pity that Rosette Anday spoils her fine contralto voice with so consistent a wobble. She sings an air of Handel, and 'Erbarme dich mein Gott' from the 'St. Matthew' Passion, with the Vienna State Opera Orchestra, conducted by Alwin. The violin obbligato in the Bach is beautifully played by Franz Malrecker (D1664).

If prizes were given for power this month's blue riband would go to Benvenuto Franci, who makes the rafters ring with a couple of arias from 'La Gioconda.' He is accompanied by La Scala Orchestra, conducted by Savagno, which plays up so well to his vociferous example that it should certainly have the second prize (DB1117).

John Goss sings at his best in a couple of records of old songs—'Flow not so fast,' 'There is a garden in her face,' 'O eyes, O mortal stars,' and 'Come, my Celia.' These are accompanied on the lute by Diana Poulton. I shall no doubt be expected to go into raptures over the lute, and to prefer it to the pianoforte for accompanying purposes. At the risk of disappointing the purists and of being called a Philistine, I vote for the pianoforte. The tinkling lute is pleasant, but inadequate as an accompaniment to a substantial baritone voice (B2822). By the way, the labelling staff has excelled itself in connection with this record. The songs are all ascribed on the label to a composer new to me—Hessiltine. I take it that this means that the songs are sung from the edition made by Phillip Heseltine. Anyway, if we are to have the wrong composer's name we might at least have the right spelling.

Paul Robeson sings four more 'spirituals': 'Git on board, lil' children,' 'Dere 's no hidin' place,' 'Oh! rock me, Julie,' and 'Oh! didn't it rain.' These will please those who still have a palate for this overworked type. Robeson's singing tends to become monotonous through his choice of an invariably low pitch. Apparently he is unable to manage top notes comfortably—at all events that is my impression after hearing him in a record containing some high notes. His magnificent voice seems to have been inadequately trained, and so he is safe and comfortable only on the ground floor (B3033).

There are two choral records, which, though good, are not wholly satisfying. The Westminster Abbey Special Choir is heard in Byrd's magnificent 'Exsurge Domine,' and William Child's 'O bone Jesu,' the latter with organ accompaniment. There are some good expressive touches in the Child (this Motet is probably the best example of his work), but in the Byrd there is a lack of power and climax. Anyway, I am not thrilled by it as I was by the old record of this work made by the English Singers. So we see that numbers matter less than is generally supposed (C1678).

The Dayton U.S.A. Choir, conducted by John Finley Williamson, sing pieces by Lotti and Palestrina with fair success. Their arrangement of the slow movement from Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony to a feeble text, 'Goin' home,' may be very popular in the States, but I do not think it will make many friends here. Tonally, and indeed in every way, this record does the choir less than justice. I heard them sing the same works at the Albert Hall, and the gramophone gives but little idea of their unusually fine vocal resources and finished singing (D1647).

COLUMBIA

Unusually brilliant and powerful is the Hallé Orchestra's record of Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Capriccio Espagnole,' conducted by Sir Hamilton Harty. This is the kind of lavish power that I can always enjoy, because it is not mere noise, and the playing is first-rate (9716-17).

From time to time we hear snatches of Johann Strauss's opera, 'Der Fledermaus,' and they are usually of a quality to make us wish to hear the whole work. Here is the Overture, a capital, lively piece of light music played by the Berlin State Orchestra conducted by Bruno Walter (L2311).

I found Saint-Saëns's 'Le Rouet d'Omphale,' as played by the Orchestre de la Société des Concerts du Conservatoire, Paris, conducted by Gaubert, less interesting than usual. It seems to need a more varied performance (9719).

Having found fault with the Capet String Quartet's playing of some late Beethoven, I am glad to be able to give them high praise for their performance of the Quartet in A, Op. 18. They exhibit here far more life and variety. I part company with them, however, in the matter of the pace of the Minuet. They play it far too slowly, I feel. It has the effect almost of a slow movement, with the result that the Andante that follows cannot make its proper contrast. Granted that most people play classical minuets too quickly, there is still a difference between stateliness and actual slowness (D1659).

The Madami Quartet of mandolines and guitars play an arrangement of a Giga by Vivaldi, and an Andante Mosso by Scarlatti. Of these I prefer the latter. The Giga is rather too sedate in pace, and it is surely a mistake to make a pronounced rallentando at one point. If there is one movement that ought to be continuously fast from start to finish it is a jig (5396).

Records of the Sheffield Choir have hitherto disappointed me somewhat. Here are a couple that are really excellent and do something like justice to the singers. Sir Henry Coward made a good choice of four choruses from 'Judas Maccabæus,' and he has done well to include among them 'See the conqu'ring hero comes.' There is much brilliant singing, and the orchestral part, especially the trumpet, is unusually effective. The ensemble goes awry in a couple of points near the end of 'Sing unto God,' but the flaws are easily forgiven in view of the excellence of the remainder (9724).

PARLOPHONE

Some unusually good samples are here, especially in regard to surface. I have not for a long time heard such a near approach to noiseless running. The best orchestral record is that of the Berlin State Opera Orchestra, conducted by Hans Knappertsbusch, playing the 'Waltz Scene' from Richard Strauss's 'Intermezzo.' This is glowing and brilliant work (E10860).

No less good as a record, though of less interest from the musical point of view of most of us, is a record of the same players, conducted by Dr. Weissmann, in the 'Dance of the Hours' from 'La Gioconda' (E10859).

The pick of the basket, however, is the batch of three records giving us the first two movements of Dvorák's 'Cello Concerto, played by Emanuel Feuermann with the Berlin State Opera Orchestra, conducted by Michael Taube. The work is generally admitted to show Dvorák at his best, and it receives full justice here from both playing and recording points of view. I have rarely enjoyed records more than these. The balance is not quite flawless, but a little over-prominence on the part of the soloist is excusable, owing to the problem of ensuring that the 'cello shall stand out from the strings of the orchestra. But the orchestral part is never allowed to be obscure, and the wood-wind in the quieter passages is a delight (E10856-57-58).

There are two excellent records of extracts from 'Der Rosenkavalier,' the soloists being Meta Seinemeyer, Grete Merrem-Nikisch, and Emanuel List in 'Nicht dort, dort ist das Vorzimmer,' and 'Bin con so viel Finesse charmiert' (E10864); and Meta Seinemeyer, Elsa Stunzner, and Grete Merrem-Nikisch in 'Mein Gott, s'war mehr wie eine Farce,' and 'Hab' mir's gelobt ihn Lieb zu haben' (E10865), all with the Berlin State Opera House Orchestra conducted by Weissmann. These records would be hard to beat as examples of fine ensemble work.

Similar high praise must be given to a record of the Finale of Act 2 of 'Der Fledermaus' by the other Strauss, Johann, and with the same orchestra and conductor, the singers being Lotte Lehmann, Karin Branzell, Grete Merrem-Nikisch, Richard Tauber, and Waldemar Staegemann (R20085).

DECCA

Apparently these are the first Decca records, the company having hitherto been indentified only with the manufacture of gramophones. The batch shows enterprise and variety. The recording generally is excellent, but the surface in some cases leaves something to be desired. The most ambitious effort is Delius's 'Sea Drift.' Few choral works present more formidable difficulties from a recording point of view. There is not only the problem of balance between the soloist, chorus, and orchestra. The music itself is of an elusive type that can be only partially captured by the gramophone, even under the most favourable conditions. In fact, I do not recall a single example of a Delius recording that is as indisputably successful as are the best examples of works by other composers. These considerations must be borne in mind when judging this Decca reproduction. It gives us much that is beautiful, but the definition is not sufficiently good for the average hearer who is ignorant of the work. The words of the chorus are vague, and even those of the excellent soloist, Mr. Roy Henderson, are heard only fitfully. As I happen to know the work well I was able to supply many details mentally, but even so I feel that a vocal score is a necessary aid. Armed with this, the gramophonist will derive great pleasure from these records of what many of us regard as Delius's most beautiful work. The orchestra is the New Symphony, the choir is simply 'Choir,' and the conductor is unnamed—oddly, for he has an unusually arduous and responsible task (S10010-12).

Several orchestral records have been made by the Hastings Municipal Orchestra, conducted by Basil Cameron. I like best that of the Overture to Offenbach's 'Orpheus in the Underworld,' which is played with vigour and brilliance (T101).

Friedmann's Slavonic Rhapsody, arranged by Woodhouse, strikes me as being uninteresting music (M2).

Nor am I very favourably struck by No. M1, which gives us Gabriel-Marie's 'Sérénade Badine' and Walton O'Donnell's Pizzicato. As the former exploits pizzicato too, we have rather an overdose of a device which soon loses its effect. These records were made in the New White Rock Pavilion, which shows itself to be excellent for recording purposes.

The list mentions a 'Jutish Medley' (Danish folk-songs) by Percy Grainger, also conducted by Mr. Cameron, but the record was not included in my parcel. I mention it on the strength of the promising title (A1002).

There is a good military band record of Suppé's 'Light Cavalry' Overture, and the ubiquitous 'Dance of the Hours' from 'La Gioconda,' conducted by Julian Clifford (M25).

The 'Bell Song' from 'Lakmé' is sung with some lack of polish by Olga Olgina, who has an unusually good voice (S10002).

Dale Smith sings well in three of Vaughan Williams's 'Songs of Travel.' The effect would have been better with pianoforte. The orchestral accompaniment is not only unnecessary; it is also too loud, and at times almost drowns the singer (M35).

Tom Kinniburgh's excellent voice is heard in 'The Road to the Isles' (a poorish tune despite its Hebridean origin), and the 'Piper o' Dundee.' He sings the latter too slowly and seriously for my taste. (Perhaps I have been spoilt by having heard some very racy performances of this song by pawky folk-singers at Scottish Competition Festivals (M10).)

The St. Peter's Singers (male voices) sing neatly Beale's 'This pleasant month of May,' and a 'spiritual,' 'Heav'n, heav'n.' The voices are good, but I still cannot overcome my distaste for the male alto voice in the abstract. All male-voice parties should aim at a tenor lead (M9).

There is an abundant supply of Fox-trots and other similar fare, but they do not come within the scope of this review.

NATIONAL GRAMOPHONIC SOCIETY

Debussy's Sonata for violin and pianoforte is on so small a scale that Sonatina would be a fitter title. Andre Mangeot and Lisle Barbour give it a generally good performance, which suffers from an occasional meagreness of tone on the part of the violinist, especially in some of the quieter passages. The Sonata fills three sides, the odd one being given to Debussy's 'Les sons et les parfums tournent dans l'air du soir,' played by Lyell Barbour. In both these records, by the way, the surface is less good than usual, a defect that may be responsible for the tonal fault mentioned above (127-128).

The better of the two issues is that of Mozart's D major Sonata (K576), played with delightful crispness and clarity by Kathleen Long. The fourth side of a pair of discs gives us three charming old pieces—a Minuet and Air by Muffat and Couperin's 'Le Tic-Toc-Choc ou Les Maillotins' (129-130).

NEW OPERAS AT DUISBURG

By Oscar Thompson

Of nine unfamiliar stage works, all in a sense new and all bespeaking some phase of the contemporaneous if not the last word of modernity, only two left other than rapidly-fading recollections with this American visitor at the Duisburg Festival, officially the fifty-ninth Tonkünstlerfest des Allgemeinen Deutschen Musikvereins, of date July 2-7. These two were Arnold Schönberg's 'Die Glückliche Hand,' by no means the bore in the theatre that easy-chair analysis might lead a too-cocksure critic to expect, and Max Brand's glorification of the fly-wheel and of brutality in man, 'Maschinist Hopkins.' Both cultivate assiduously the somewhat morbid appeal that is in the harrowing, the hopeless, the inexorable. Unseen forces whisper in the dark, in one instance the demons of destiny, in the other the voices of machines that become articulate for the purpose of making more startling an eerie murder in their midst. So impelling is the visual element of both works, even though that of 'Die Glückliche Hand' is more phantasy than drama, and cryptic phantasy at best, that the music serves much such scenic purpose as the lights and the stage properties.

That, indeed, was at once the virtue and the fault, chiefly the great fault, of the operas at Duisburg; their dramatic interest utterly transcended their musical importance. Save in the Schönburg opus, there could be little incentive to seek for anything rewarding to the purely musical sense, aside from stage performance of the tonalized plays; and even with respect to the Schönberg, all thought as to its availability for concert projection evaporated in the light of what the stage performance revealed. The score has been sufficiently analysed in the past. It is now some sixteen years old, and its atonality is no longer strange. But in all these years 'Die Glückliche Hand' (if one may accept the information available in Duisburg) had but two stage performances prior to this Festival, one at Vienna, the other at Breslau. There were two at Duisburg, the second being added over-night to the programme when Schönberg came from Berlin to attend it. This was the second time he had heard his work in its sixteen years—once at Vienna, once at Duisburg.

The power of 'Die Glückliche Hand' on the stage is the power of de Maupassant's 'Horla.' It insinuates what cannot be put into words, the nameless terrors that the dark sends shuddering through the blood of children. Its title is quite the strangest symbol of its dark allegory. There is no 'happiness' in this work; every mirage of fortune leads straight to despair. It is agonized, dispiriting, hopeless, and hope-destroying. If the mission of music primarily is a consolatory one, this is no music at all. But the art of its facture, the skill of its suggestion, cannot be put aside.

'Maschinist Hopkins,' like 'Die Glückliche Hand,' has been discussed abroad as the result of some previous performances, given at Duisburg. It has yet to find its way to one of the larger and internationally celebrated opera houses. Possibly it never will. If it does, the hope may be devoutly expressed that everyone concerned, from the impresario to the individual artists and the stage technicians, be sent to Duisburg to learn how it should be done. In all that pertains to regie, this and other productions in the Rhineland city were revelations to one who has heard opera in the world capitals. Singers act at Duisburg, not in the manner of an exceptional individual star, like Chaliapin, but in a strikingly co-ordinated acting-ensemble, altogether comparable to that of spoken drama. Perhaps they were chosen primarily for dramatic rather than vocal gifts. The works of the Tonkünstlerfest permitted little of what could be called 'song' as criteria for appraisal of the ability to sing. But the voices were used expressively and naturally in a song-speech that possessed an extraordinary finish. In all that pertains to lighting and to stage transformations these were superior performances. Technicians from the great opera houses could, with profit, sit at the feet of the men who put these new works on. The settings were the best examples of the 'ultraist' manner this commentator has encountered anywhere. Like them or loathe them, they were never routine, they had individuality, they manifested ideas.

Separate the music of 'Maschinist Hopkins' from the melodrama which it underscores and makes more lurid, and perhaps only the episodes devoted to the machines would similarly transcend industrious routine. That of the whispered voices in the machine-room inevitably recalled similar whisperings in 'Die Glückliche Hand,' perhaps unfairly for Brand, since this episode was exceedingly effective in its own right. But are almost toneless whisperings music? The machine shop in full operation had its measure of mechanical fascination, but when the composer turned to the writing of his love music he could only echo the night melos of 'Tristan and Isolde.' His use of jazz to picture a New York night club, and again a low 'dive' known as 'Bondy's Bar' was perhaps a little more idiomatic than Krenek's in the sportive 'Jonny spielt auf.' It characterises—again the 'scenic' in music—but it is inferior, in its kind, to the pot-boiler jazz of a hundred writers of popular music for revues and musical comedies. The chief asset of 'Maschinist Hopkins' is its abundant energy. This the music possesses in consanguinity with the brutal story.

Text-setting apparently engrossed the composers of several others among the Duisburg operas to such a degree as to forbid lyric expansions, either in the vocal writing or the orchestra. The result was not infrequently a drain upon the endurance and the patience of the most willing listener. Hellmut Groop fashioned his 'George Dandin' so faithfully after Molière that his dialogue, line for line, came as near the equivalent of a spoken play as the most literal heart could wish—if, indeed, there are those who sincerely feel that this is the mission of music, on the stage or elsewhere—merely to substitute for speech. Under this endless and fatiguing dialogue was an orchestra that worked its will with the dissonantal devices of modern chamber music, sometimes with recognisable commentary on the stage action, more often going its polytonal way—a dry, edged, hard-line-against-hard-line way; its ironics including the semblance of a ballet danced to music without the semblance of ballet music.

Two dramas of classic austerity also challenged attention, and exhausted it, on the basis of text-setting. Emil Peeters's 'Die Troerinnen' interfered only a little with Euripides, as made over into German by Franz Werfel. That little consisted chiefly of making the words less clear, though they were very skilfully fashioned into musical phrases not unlike those of 'Pelléas et Mélisande,' with an instrumental score providing atmosphere in something of the same manner; though, necessarily for the subject, harsher and more positive, and making free use of the harmonic license that has come into music since Debussy's time. 'Die Troerinnen' was something of an achievement; more so, this visitor felt, than Paul Kick-Schmidt's somewhat similar 'Tullia.' This drama of the Romans had an exciting closing scene that was exceedingly deft in its handling, and the endless declamation of the earlier scenes exemplified, no doubt, a considerable measure of skill. But the skilled artisan is not to be confounded with the man who can create beauty, whatever the fashion or the spirit of the time.

In his 'Traumspiel,' Julius Weissmann, no such young man as most of the Duisburg composers, harks back to Mahler. This, indeed, is much such an opera as Mahler might have written if he had turned from the symphony to composition for the stage. It has his mastery of the huge orchestra, his soaring aspirations, his glimpses of the distant ideal, his tendency to tumble out of the clouds into the street. August Strindberg's verbal symbolism is both a prop and a burden. The metaphor of music, added to the allegory of words, often tends to make opaque what must be transparent if the symbol is to be grasped. Indra's Daughter brings light into a world of heartbreak. But she does not escape its banalities. The orchestra, on occasion, sings of infinite compassion; and the music is best when it is most symphonic—also most Mahleresque.

A facile hand, an engaging fancy, but no very individual musical creation went into Hans Chemin-Petit's 'Der gefangene Vogel,' but as this is the work of a man now but twenty-seven years old, it is perhaps fair to regard it more in the light of promise than of fulfilment. The manner is more Italian than German; the subject, an Oriental phantasy of the fairy-tale order, with pigtails, pagoda, prologue, and after-word. In 'Diana's Hochzeit,' a naughty episode of Southern Spain, Paul Strüver found a métier and milieu of slight resemblance to Ravel's 'L'Heure Espagnol,' but the treatment, orchestrally, is of a full-blooded, even popular tunefulness—the pseudo-Spanish tunefulness that Ravel evaded in the tantalising ironics of his delicate post-impressionism. Strüver might with better success have given some of his tunes to his stage voices. The result would at least have been passable operetta. As satirical opera it misses fire, even as abetted by the whimsical settings and the adroit handling of its changes of scene by the Duisburg regisseurs. 'Salambo,' a dance-drama by Hans Tiessen, carried a greater measure of conviction, though it suffered from juxtaposition on a triple bill with 'Die Glückliche Hand.' If the music would scarcely withstand transference to the concert hall, after the fashion of the Stravinsky mimeodramas, it serves its theatre purpose in providing a colourful and mildly stridulous background for the tapestry of love and death which the dance principals weave in an engrossing set of pictures for the eye-minded.

Of the choral and chamber music brought forward at three concerts which were also a part of this surfeit of the new, there is no imperative need to expatiate. Compositions in varying forms came from the pens of Wilhelm Kempff, Otto Crucius, Hans Gebhard, Hans Lang, Philippine Schick, Julius Schloss, Ernst Pepping, Werner Jüllig, Kurt Thomas, Karl Schäfer, Herbert Eimert, Kaspar Roesseling, and Emil Peeters. Frau Schick's 'Der Einsame an Gott,' a cantata for dramatic soprano, lyric baritone, women's chorus, and string orchestra, brought a welcome reminder that there are still composers who are moved to contemplate the spiritual. This cantata is good music, not without reminders of Mahler and Brahms.

Occasional Notes

What is unvocal music? The current issue of Music and Letters contains a symposium on the subject, the writers being Drs. Ernest Walker and E. C. Bairstow, Prof. Dent, and Messrs. Steuart Wilson, Paul England, Gregory Hast, and Owen Colyer. A further instalment is promised for the October number. Although the usefulness of the discussion will depend on the extent to which it is read by composers, it should be added that the articles contain much that every singer will do well to study. The ground is pretty well covered, despite some shortage of concrete examples; and, as usually happens in discussions of any aspect of singing, there is startling difference of opinion on some points. We take one only. Mr. Gregory Hast says: 'I think most singers will agree that certain vowels are difficult to negotiate in the high registers of the voice,' and gives an instance. Per contra, hear Mr. Colyer: 'To protest that it is not always possible to sing the right word on the right note cannot be contemplated. To say, for instance, that a more beautiful tone can be obtained on the E flat on the vowel a than on the vowel e would be a denial of the singer's birthright, his priceless privilege of words—would put the tickling of the ear above the stimulus of the imagination, would exalt the flesh above the spirit.'

Mr. England takes much the same view. Prof. Dent, however, says: 'Teachers of singing often say that a good singer ought to be able to sing any vowel on any note of his voice, but for practical purposes composers ought to know that each type of voice has its peculiarities in this respect.' Dr. Bairstow goes into practical detail, and shows how and why it is that closed vowels are difficult for women's voices in the high register. We think that most singers and teachers will take the Hast-Dent-Bairstow view, and will agree that composers usually give too little attention to this point. Fine words about the 'singer's birthright' butter no parsnips; they simply ignore physical facts.

(By the way, we are glad to see that Music and Letters has obtained more than the hundred subscribers its editor asked for. He returns thanks in the handsomest way by adding ten pages to the July number.)

The winding up of the B.N.O.C. has evoked general regret and sympathy. The company has done much excellent work, but once more it has been proved that a tussle between art and an overdraft can end in only one way, sooner or later—generally sooner. (The winding-up meeting was naturally on an emotional plane—so much so as to present Punch with a chance. Tears having been shed, who could resist the obvious opening? Not Punch; hence a reference to 'voluntary liquidation.') Happily, the demise of the company occurred just as the Covent Garden Syndicate had decided to send out in the autumn a strong touring company, into which a number of the B.N.O.C. singers will accordingly be absorbed.

In spite of this B.N.O.C. collapse, opera will be almost a drug in the market next season. In addition to the Covent Garden project, Sir Thomas Beecham's Opera League is expected to begin operations; Mr. R. L. Stuart announces a seven-weeks' season at the Scala Theatre; and Capt. Cuthbert Reaveley has issued a booklet giving particulars of an elaborate scheme of performances at certain provincial centres. We have no space to discuss Capt. Reaveley's plans, which are set forth in detail in a booklet entitled 'Civic Opera as the Basis of British Music.' (Readers can no doubt obtain copies on application to Capt. Reaveley at 45, Albany Street, N.W.1.) Last, but a long way from least, the Carl Rosa Company (which has lately been filling the Lyceum with capital performances of old favourites) will be more than ever on the spot. It is to be hoped that all these promising enterprises will not damage one another through a frequent failing in the English musical world—lack of co-operation in the matter of dates.

These lavish operatic projects, however, seem almost meagre beside the wealth of first-rate orchestral concerts announced to take place at Queen's Hall. In addition to the Promenades, there will be a six-concert Delius Festival (Beecham), twenty-three B.B.C. Symphony Concerts (Beecham, Wood, Ronald, Weingartner), the usual Philharmonic series, nine by the Hallé Orchestra, a set of six sponsored by Mrs. Samuel Courtauld (Sargent and Klemperer), and the regular Monday evening concerts of the L.S.O. The interest, however, does not lie in the mere numbers. For one thing, the standard of playing will almost inevitably be far higher than for many years past. The L.S.O. has been guaranteed three years' full-time work, so there is an end of the deputy system in one quarter at least. Many new works are promised. Thus, at the Courtauld series will be heard symphonies by Mahler and Bruckner, and the B.B.C. concerts will give a good deal that is off the beaten track.

Has London ever had spread before it such an orchestral feast as is in store for 1929-30? We doubt it. If the box office is as busy as it ought to be, mechanised music, so far from killing the public concert, may prove to have been a powerful tonic.

In regard to the 'Promenades,' we are inclined to question one new detail in the arrangements: the giving up of Thursday evenings to contemporary British music. Is this the kind of propaganda our composers need? Do they even need propaganda at all? We think not. Propaganda almost invariably implies and evokes opposition. British composers would be far better served by the regular inclusion of a proportion of their works in the miscellaneous programmes, side by side with established favourites. Their works would then be heard by the average audience, which includes many who would come for the favourite (despite the presence on the programme of a new British work), but who would not be attracted by an all-British concert. The best service we can do our contemporary music would be to lead the average hearer to regard as a matter of course its presence in the best-class orchestral concerts. Moreover, variety being the spice of life, a couple of modern British works in a programme would make better hearing than a half-dozen performed without contrast or relief provided by music of other countries and periods. Nevertheless, although we doubt the wisdom of the all-British evening at the 'Proms.,' we are not unappreciative of so handsome a gesture.

Since the above has been set up we have seen a letter in The Times from Dr. Vaughan Williams, who takes the same view, regretting the revival of the old distinction between 'music' and 'British music.' British composers, he imagines, 'would prefer that their works should be judged, for praise or blame, side by side with all other music of the past or of the present;' and he ends with the pertinent question, 'Is it still necessary to segregate the "British composer," as if he were unfit.'

In this connection we note that the Liverpool branch of the British Music Society has decided to discontinue its special concerts of contemporary music, owing to members having complained that 'programmes of such music, taken neat, are apt to cause a sort of cerebral indigestion.' The committee will continue to perform as much contemporary music as hitherto, but it will be mixed with other types.

And here is a further little gleam of light on the same subject. In a recent issue of Musical America appeared an interview with Mr. Henry Hadley, the conductor. He deplored the comparative neglect of some contemporary American composers, and went on to say: 'When I conducted in Buenos Aires several years ago, it was part of the contract to play at least one Argentine composition in each programme. Strauss and other noted conductors, when they appeared in Latin America, were also forced to subscribe to this provision. I believe it was a good thing. Alien conductors, coming here [New York] for a short stay, harassed for time, haven't the opportunity of finding out whether there is a dormant Beethoven about. They have no time to read a host of manuscripts, and if they do play American composers, they are those who have already "arrived."'

We should like to see a similar clause in most contracts in this country. Not only would the policy of 'one British work per programme' be good for our own people and our own composers; it would also send visiting conductors back to the Continent better informed as to our music than they are at present.

Several correspondents have challenged us on our attitude towards the poetry of Gertrude Stein. We are told that we don't understand the technique thereof, and so our opinion is presumptuous. It may be so; we must look into it again. For the present, however, we are busy with Miss Stein's prose. Here is a sample from her appreciation of Miss Jane Heap that appeared in a recent issue of the Little Review. It is quoted by our lively friend 'Beachcomber,' of the Daily Express:

> 'Jane it is however how had how it tried that it was J. H. or Jane Heap. Jane was her name and Jane her station and Jane her nation and Jane her situation. Thank you for thinking of how do you do how do you like your two per cent. Thank you for thinking how do you do. Thank you Jane thank you too thank you for thinking thank you for thank you. Thank you how do you. Thank you Jane thank you how do you do.
> Gertrude Stein.

Careful study will reveal a fundamental difference between this passage and the lyric we quoted in our April number. Whereas the poem bore some slight signs of being metrical, the rhapsody on Jane is continuous and in one solid chunk. In both, however, are seen the same persevering method of driving facts home. We like, too, the clarity with which the biographical details concerning Miss Heap are set forth, and the skill with which the approach is made to the climax—that little matter of the two per cent. Notable, too, is the artfulness with which the reader is left in doubt as to whether that low rate of interest is on a loan or a dividend. Thank you, Gertrude, thank you for thinking. How. How do. How do you. How do you do. Thank you. Thank you and (in order that the point may be quite clear) thank you.

In the July number of the Gramophone, Mr. Percy Scholes enters the lists in support of Mr. Compton Mackenzie's suggestion that the classics would be more popular and more easily identified if they were named instead of opus-numbered. Mr. Scholes heads his article, 'Name this child,' and draws an entertaining picture of Bach numbering his large family instead of naming them. But the analogy is more amusing than convincing. Bach had only a score or so of children (we are always a bit hazy as to the exact total, and perhaps even J. S. B. himself had to think twice about it occasionally). Had they been as numerous as his works he would have found numbering far more convenient than naming. You may number to infinity, whereas you soon reach the end of your tether if you depend on names. We had intended to discuss this matter fully, but as our contributor 'Feste' has done so we confine ourselves to this one practical point.
